MR. KINGLAKE said, he thought the view his hon. Friend the Under Secretary had taken of the case was a mistaken one. He had spoken of these officers as the mere servants of the Ionian State. That was not quite a fair light in which to regard them. In order to test whether they had or had not a moral claim for compensation for the loss of their offices, they should see in the first place who appointed them, and, next, who terminated that state of things under which they were entitled to their offices. When they came to consider who it was that drew these men from their former career of life, they found it was the Colonial Government in England. And when they inquired how it came to pass that their offices, on the continuance of which they had a fair right to rely, had been brought to a conclusion, they found again that the Colonial Office was a prominent party in the transaction. If, then, the circumstances should ever arise in which the question had to be considered, he hoped the British Government would have no difficulty in seeing that the claim of these gentlemen was one which in fairness and generosity could not be resisted.

UNION ASSESSMENT COMMITTEES.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HUBBARD said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the Returns of the Resolutions and proceedings of the Union Assessment Committees, and to the necessity of assisting their operation, by the introduction of some moderating authority in the very large latitude they had taken in the application of the Act. His object was to afford the House an opportunity of judging how far it was necessary to assist the different unions. Much depended on the spirit in which the committees set to work, and whether they did so willingly and intelligently. As might be expected there were considerable differences observable in these respects. A meeting of delegates in Somerset, presided over by Sir W. Miles, passed a Resolution to the following effect:—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

“The feeling of the delegates in discussing the different questions propounded at the meeting was unanimous in the determination, as far as was possible, not only to secure a uniform and correct valuation of parishes in any particular union, but so to construct and carry out the Act, that it should not be only between parish and parish in a particular union, but that the same principles should be the guide in every union throughout the county; so that when the valuation is completed, not only will the assessment thus established be the assessment for Poor Law purposes, but will be a true and correct basis upon which all other county charges may be estimated.”

That was a very favourable representation of the spirit of enlightened committees, but he was forced to admit that, owing possibly to the difficulties which beset their operations, the results arrived at by many unions were far from satisfactory. The first thing to be done was to arrive at a true definition of the gross estimated rental. Now, from the passing of the Act of 1836 down to 1859 there was unhappily great diversity of opinion as to the interpretation of the law in that respect. Mr. Lumley, of the Poor Law Board, in his Manual defined the gross estimated rental as rack-rent, with the addition of tenants' rates and charges. Others held that it was equivalent to the rack-rent alone; and in 1859 the Law Officers of the Crown, on being consulted by the Poor Law Board, decided in favour of that view, which was thereupon adopted by the Board. He found, however, that some of the Union Committees had ignored that decision, and in these assessments had followed Mr. Lumley's earlier interpretation; and he suggested that the Board should direct the attention of such mistaken Committees to the error they had therein committed. The next point was to ascertain the net rateable value. It appeared that the committees allowed themselves a considerable range in regard to deductions. The allowances on “naked lands,” or lands without buildings, for instance, were from 1 to 3 per cent in Somerset, 2½ per cent in Bedford, Berks, Devon, Shropshire, Suffolk, and the East Riding of Yorkshire. 1 per cent only was allowed in Walsingham and another union in Norfolk, and nothing at all in two unions in Lincoln. On the other hand he found a deduction of 5 per cent in Northampton, Hertford, Gloucester, and some other counties. One union in Gloucester allowed 7½ per cent, and Market Harborough, in Leicestershire, allowed as much as 10. In the case of land with buildings and houses attached to it, the counties of Somerset and Buckingham and two unions in Norfolk allowed from 5 to 10 per cent; in the county of Southampton the rule was to allow 5 per cent where the rent was above £200, and 10 per cent where it was under £200 a year. In Derbyshire, Worcestershire, Lancashire, the East Riding of Yorkshire, and a great part of the North and West Ridings, the allowance was $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; in Doncaster, Hartlepool, Teesdale, and part of Lincolnshire, $8\frac{1}{2}$. In other unions in Lincolnshire it was 5 per cent, and in Shropshire generally 5 per cent, although in one union it was 15, and he could find no reason for so remarkable a discrepancy. The information was much less definite in regard to the allowances on houses. In the county of Buckingham it was from 10 to 20 per cent and from 10 to 25 per cent on cottages, which embraced a class of houses under the value of £6 or £8 a year. At Hartlepool and Teesdale the allowance was $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on both houses and cottages; in Lancashire, 15 on houses and 20 on cottages; Somerset, from 10 to 15 on houses and from 10 to 20 on cottages; Cheshire, 10 per cent; Nottinghamshire, 10 on houses and 12 on cottages; and Bakewell, in Derbyshire, $12\frac{1}{2}$ on houses and 20 on cottages. The discrepancies in excess of these allowances were considerable. In the Strand union, in the county of Middlesex, the allowance on the whole of the house property was 25 per cent. And these discrepancies were not confined to the allowances in different counties, but in various unions in the same county there were also great discrepancies. For instance, in the county of Bucks, the majority of unions allowed 5 per cent on land, whereas the union of Buckingham allowed only $2\frac{1}{2}$; Newport Pagnell allowed 15 per cent on land and houses, Buckingham 10; Newport allowed 10 per cent on cottages, Buckingham 15. In Lincolnshire one parish allowed 10 per cent, another 8, another 5, and another 3; Shropshire generally allowed 5, but the Ludlow union allowed 15. He thought these discrepancies were so great that they called for correction at the hands of the Poor Law Board, because wherever they existed in the same county certain unions must necessarily be placed at a disadvantage with regard to the county rate, for it was admitted that the Union Assessment was to be the basis, not only of the Poor Law Assessment, but of the county rate. Great inconvenience arose from swerving from the requirement of the Act, that the assessment should be framed from the most truthful estimates which could be arrived at in reference to the gross rental and the necessary deductions for maintenance. It was no answer to say that an entire county agreed in accepting an enormous and disproportionate deduction. It had no right to do so. One class in particular was injuriously affected by such a system — namely, the clergy. The tithe rent charge was known to a farthing, and the outgoings were so few that there was no margin for granting any concession except the proper one. The clergy, therefore, were rated on their tithe rent-charge to the fullest amount. They had no right to complain of that, but they had a right to complain if, in their own locality, other property was assessed upon an incorrect basis. Upon that ground he trusted the Government would see that some alteration was imperatively required wherever these extravagant deductions had been made. Accuracy was in this matter desirable on more grounds than one. Even the elective franchise was materially affected by the process of assessment. House property had been generally valued at two-thirds of its value, so that a house worth £10 was only valued at £7, and many occupiers hitherto excluded would be admitted to the franchise under a truthful assessment. On these grounds he thought the matter required investigation, and in the absence of correct results by any other means, he thought they ought to be obtained by the appointment of Government Inspectors. He might be told that it was easy to point out discrepancies; but, with regard to the deductions, could he point out what should be their limit independently of differences of soil and locality? He thought he could at all events name the amounts which would ordinarily apply. Those limits were $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on naked land, 10 per cent on farms, 20 per cent on houses, and 25 per cent on cottages. These allowances would, he thought, meet all but exceptional cases. If a farmer appealed against his assessment at 10 per cent on that principle, he might demand the assessment of land and house separately, and in that case there would be no relief, unless the house assessed at 20 per cent were nearly equal in value to the land assessed at $2\frac{1}{2}$, a thing which would rarely occur, but still there was the remedy. As to "accommodation land," its assessment according to the rent is objected to as excessive. "We admit," say the occupiers, "that we give the rent at which we are assessed, but it is more than it is worth; we give it because the property is near our residence, or is convenient for our business, but the rent is beyond its value." But it is obvious that if the demand for abatement were conceded, they would be enabled to pay an excessive rent at the cost of the other ratepayers. A larger question was the assessment of parsonages and mansions. Parsons had complained of their assessments on the grounds that their residences could not, by law, be let without the sanction of the bishop; and squires, that their mansions, the land and shooting being let off, would not let at all. Both parties had caught at the words of the Act, that the annual value should be that at which the property would "let from year to year;" but the spirit as well as the letter of the Act was that they should be assessed at the "net annual value;" and in the case both of the parsonage and the mansion the right course would be to estimate what the house would let for if the owner were out of it and wanted it again. In fact, neither the squire himself nor the parson could be ignored in estimating the value of their occupations. There was great diversity in the practice of various unions in respect to the mode of ascertaining the gross rental of houses, and in settling the deductions. The only deduction which ought to be made out of gross rental, according to the analogy of farms and other property, was that for repairs. So with respect to the tithe rent charge, in some cases the amount of the rent charge, as commuted, was adopted; in others the last year's receipts, and in others again the cost of collection was deducted before entering the "gross estimated rental." He thought these anomalies should be removed, and the assessments be rendered uniform. Then, as to the deductions on account of the stipend of a curate, the law was most puzzling. It appeared to be an anomaly that there should be no deduction for the performance of the duty by the parson himself, but that there should be a deduction when the performance was by means of a substitute. It was, he submitted, necessary to include within the operation of the Union Assessment Committee, places and parishes which were now external to it. It was a great anomaly that parishes and unions should be exempted from the operation of two Assessment Acts which had passed that House, and it was absolutely due to the rest of the unions of the same county, that these exemptions should be removed. All parishes acting under local Acts should be brought in this respect under the general law. He next came to the nature of the matters to be assessed. Last year a considerable number of petitions were presented to that House praying for the removal of anomalies in regard to the exemption of particular classes of property, and a still greater number had been presented that year. A striking exhibition of the absurdity of the law as it now stood was this, that all mines but coal mines were exempt from rates. How had that happened? Because the lawyers maintained that, according to the true construction of the law of Elizabeth, coal mines only being specifically mentioned as rateable, all other mines must be excepted. In the time of Elizabeth coal mines probably were the only mines of importance in existence; but that was no reason why the Legislature should continue to exempt all other kinds of mines. A gentleman from Leeds had written to him that in a neighbouring township there were large stone quarries, which were not assessed either to the poor or the highway rates, although accidents in them greatly augmented the poor rates, and the stone waggons cut the roads into ribbons. The feeling on that question was so strongly in favour of a more rational and equitable adjustment that he believed no difficulty would be found in satisfying even those who might naturally demur at relinquishing the privileges they had so long enjoyed. He trusted, whatever the present impressions of the hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board on a mere casual discussion of the subject, he might be enabled to lay before the House next Session some legislative proposition for remedying the grievances to which he had referred.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he felt gratified to observe the attention which the hon. Gentleman had given to the working of the Act throughout the country. He had pointed out defects in the law and its administration, but it was only fair to consider what the question of local assessment had been up to that time, that it had been a system under which persons had almost been allowed to tax themselves, and under which the levying of £8,000,000 sterling had been intrusted to the most incompetent and irresponsible hands. The Act which had been substituted for a system that had been in operation for centuries had only been in existence for eighteen months, and the hon. Gentleman should not therefore be too impatient of actual or seeming irregularities, seeing that they were not the necessary consequences of the Act, and that every year they might be expected to diminish in number. The hon. Gentleman had called attention to certain irregularities that he had observed, and which he brought seriatim under the notice of the House. Some of these irregularities had come under his (Mr. C. P. Villier's) notice, and others had not. The hon. Gentleman first insisted upon the necessity of assisting the operation of the Union Assessment Committees by enforcing the legal construction of the gross estimated rental. He presumed his hon. Friend's meaning was, that the House should legislate further on the subject, but he did not know what else could be done that had not been provided for already. The hon. Gentleman referred to a legal construction having been put on the words "gross estimated rental." That definition had been given by the Law Officers of the Crown; it had been embodied in an Act of Parliament, and had been recognized in courts of justice; and a circular had been issued by the Poor Law Board, and addressed to all the Poor Law Unions in the country, directing them to act on that definition. Therefore, everything that law and authority could do had been done to impress the unions with the fact that there was a definition of gross estimated rental on which they might rely. The hon. Gentleman said there were some unions—he did not mention them—which persisted in disregarding the Act of Parliament and the circular of the Poor Law Board. If so he did not know what other legislation would induce these Assessment Committees to do otherwise. The instances to which his hon. Friend referred were, he believed, very few and far between. Of 700 unions he did not think there would be found six that disregarded the law of the land and the directions of the Poor Law Board. The hon. Gentleman next pointed to the wide range of deductions made by these Assessment Committees in obtaining the net rateable value. Having ascertained the gross estimated rental, they were allowed a discretion in determining the value to be rated, and his hon. Friend found a want of uniformity in the different unions. It was possible that might be the case at first, but his hon. Friend had not explained the circumstances so as to enable the House to declare that the Assessment Committees were not justified in these differences. The range of deduction might be 15 per cent in one county and only 10 per cent in another, but the House was not therefore to presume that the Assessment Committees had acted capriciously. The Act, as he had stated, had hardly been in operation eighteen months, and the publicity given to the assessment would cause the irregularity to cure itself. When the House was asked to legislate on the subject, he wanted to know how the want of uniformity could be cured unless Parliament fixed a maximum that should never be exceeded of 10 per cent, or some other percentage, as deduction for repairs, &c. But his hon. Friend must know that something depended on the character of the soil, the climate, and twenty things that belonged to one county and not to another. A maximum would be very arbitrary, and at all events it would not be desirable on the scanty information before the House, and so soon after the passing of the Act, to legislate on such a matter. He could not for these reasons agree to limit the range of deductions by law. His hon. Friend next asked him to prohibit arbitrary abatements from actual yearly rentals of property proposed upon the plea of its being accommodation land, and to declare that the value to the occupant of a mansion or parsonage was not to be ignored in estimating the assessable value of such property. He would grant that these arbitrary abatements ought not to be made, but his hon. Friend must remember that there was a power of appeal against anything arbitrary or unjust which had never existed before. He believed that the Assessment Committees were composed of competent men, and able and honourable men, who had done their duty in a manner which could hardly have been expected of them. The suggestions of his hon. Friend seemed to cast doubt upon their competency and honesty, but he certainly could not agree with him in that matter. His hon. Friend had laid great stress upon the tithe rent charge, but in what he said upon that subject he thought there was a little confusion, because of all descriptions of rateable property the value of tithe rent charge was the most readily and certainly ascertainable. There were questions as to the deductions which the clergyman was entitled to make, and of these there were two which were always and fairly admitted—one for the repair of the chancel of the church, and the other for the risk of collection. His hon. Friend had dealt chiefly with the deduction for the stipend of the curate. He was quite sure that the desire of the hon. Gentleman was to befriend the clergy, but he thought that in their interests he had better leave that matter alone. Formerly the clergy were never allowed that deduction, and some years ago the question was referred to a Committee of that House, who strongly recommended that no such deduction should be sanctioned. A case was then taken to the Court of Queen's Bench, and it was decided that the stipend of the curate might be deducted in cases in which the duties were so overwhelming that they could not be performed by the incumbent alone, or in cases in which the Bishop insisted upon the employment of a curate. Since then the Courts had set their faces against any extension of this principle, and both Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and Mr. Justice Blackburn had questioned the soundness of the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench. His hon. Friend asked him when the Government would consider the propriety of introducing a Bill to amend the law, by including within the operation of the Union Assessment Committee Act "all places and parishes now external to it." He thought that his hon. Friend had not fully considered what these places were, and what were the objects of the Union Assessment Act. That Act applied strictly to unions, and the places to which he referred were not unions or parts of unions. One of the first objects of the Act was to find a correct basis upon which to levy the parochial contributions to the common fund. These places that were not unions or parts of unions had no common fund, nor did they contribute to any. He did not mean to say that in such parishes and places there was no irregularity in the assessment of property; but they did not come within the scope of the Union Assessment Act. A single parish having no guardians could have no assessment committee. His hon. Friend also asked him whether he would bring in a Bill to extend the liability to rating to woods, mines, and other property which had hitherto been exempted. That was rather a difficult question to reply to. As his hon. Friend knew, several attempts had recently been made to legislate upon the subject, and he need not refer to the particular reasons which had prevented their success. He could only say that he had very carefully examined the evidence taken by a

Committee of that House a few years ago, and he must confidently state that, so far as he understood the matter, there was no reason for these exemptions. The technical construction of the law was all very well in the courts, but if taxation was to be equal, and property was to bear the burdens to which it was liable fairly, it was not right that one class of property should be exempt from, while others were liable to, rating. Where property was of such a kind that it was difficult or impossible to collect the rates, that was a ground for exemption; but in this instance no such reason existed. The exemptions were not universal throughout the United Kingdom; they did not exist either in Scotland or Ireland. The ground on which the courts had held that mines other than coal mines were exempt was that they were not mentioned in the Act of Elizabeth; but they were liable to highway rates, sewers rates, church rates, and other rates which were not fixed, as was now so much the fashion, upon the basis of the poor rate. The exemptions having endured for a very long time, there were in existence a great number of interests which would be very tenacious of the exemptions which they had enjoyed so long; therefore, it was not easy to produce a change. It was, however, one of the advantages of the Act that all these matters were being looked into very closely, and judging from the memorials which had been received by the Poor Law Board, and the petitions which had been presented to that House, he could not believe that the same influence and interest which had hitherto prevented a change would prevail in the future. Whatever was practical in that matter he should be ready to recommend to the House, but it was no use introducing Bills when there was no chance of carrying them. He did not, however, believe that it was impossible to levy rates, either upon mines or woods. He hoped that his hon. Friend would not be too impatient with respect to the operation of the Act. It was substituting a rule and order for the confusion which had hitherto existed. Things did not proceed very rapidly in this country, and his hon. Friend would no doubt be thought a little in advance of the rest of the world in his suggestion that more power ought to be assumed by the central board. He had no doubt that if a proper survey had been made and the assessment had been left in the hands of the Government officers, the thing would have been done more perfectly and more promptly, but his hon. Friend knew what was the system in this country, and how tenacious the people were of their local self-government and of doing everything for themselves. His only astonishment was that this Bill had worked so well, the best proof of which was the increase which had taken place in the amount of assessments. From a list which he held in his hands he found the increase in the valuations in the under-mentioned unions to be as follows:—Birkenhead, before the Act, £204,453, by the Committee, £290,091; Altonham, before the Act, £198,465, by the Committee, £258,314; Penzance, before the Act, £115,714, by the Committee, £143,837; Romford, before the Act, £125,770, by the Committee, £150,137; Medway, before the Act, £101,338, by the Committee, £145,233; Alverstoke, before the Act, £128,000, by the Committee, £193,145; Wolverhampton, before the Act, £209,100, by the Committee, £318,274; Cardiff, before the Act, £167,623, by the Committee, £277,460. It simply remained for him to assure his hon. Friend that he would give every consideration to those matters which he had brought before the House, and to repeat what he had before stated in the course of the Session, that he thought every person occupying the office he had the honour to hold ought to be in a position, from the evidence he would shortly have of the working of the Act, to introduce such Amendments as might be required to enable it to be worked efficiently.

BRITISH CLAIMS ON PORTUGAL.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. AYRTON said, he rose to call attention to the unsatisfied claims of British subjects on the Portuguese Government, and to move for papers. However much hon. Members might differ with respect to the duties of a Foreign Secretary, there could scarcely be any doubt that he could not be more usefully employed than in protecting the interests of British subjects abroad. He was, therefore, anxious to bring under the notice of the Foreign Office a case which appeared to him to be one of singular injustice. He had already called the attention of the House to the case during the last Session, and he consequently need not trouble them again at any length. In 1858 the Minister of Public Works in Portugal was extremely anxious to establish a line of steam communication between Lisbon and the Portuguese possessions on the African coast. He sought to attain his object by setting up a national joint-stock company at Lisbon, but when the design was matured he found himself in the position—in which Foreign Governments did not unfrequently find themselves—of not possessing the means requisite to carry out his object, and naturally looked to England to supply him with the necessary resources for the purpose. Application was accordingly made to some shipowners in this country, who said they were quite prepared to treat with him for the sale of vessels suited for the proposed line of packets. They were, however, anxious to have adequate security for the value of their ships before they parted with them, and instituted very careful inquiry as to how they were to be paid. The Portuguese Minister after some time arranged that the company which was about to purchase the vessels—not having a large amount of ready cash—should buy them on the credit of shares, which should be made equivalent to money by being guaranteed by the Portuguese Government. A dividend of 7 per cent was secured on the shares, and a further sum was raised on debentures, the interest on which was fixed at 6 per cent. The owners of the vessels, however, would not part with them until an act of association was framed and the guarantee confirmed by a vote of the Cortes. They further pointed out that as their debtors were a Portuguese company, over which the English shareholders had little or no control, it was expedient that the Government of Portugal should find some means of preventing them from misconducting their affairs and thus rendering the shares of little or no value. The Minister of Public Works accordingly appointed two Commissioners to watch over the company, and the owners of the ships thought that everything had at last been made safe. The shares and debentures were accordingly accepted and the ships and the money supplied. After, however, the undertaking had been in existence two or three years, it appeared that the Government Commissioners, instead of taking care that everything should be conducted in an honest and straightforward manner, were rather conniving at the irregularities which were taking place. The result was that the company got into a state of insolvency and had to appeal to the Government, who advanced a sum of £100,000 to relieve them from their embarrassments, and thus as mortgagees became the principal owners of the whole undertaking. The English shareholders under those circumstances were naturally desirous that the affairs of the company should be closely investigated; but the directors, with the connivance of the commissioners, actually created a number of shares for the purposes of a meeting, and with the power thus attained they were able to outvote the rest of the shareholders, to dispose of the shares according to their own wishes, and to vote themselves free from blame or liability in the matter. The English shareholders found, of course, that the shares were, in consequence of those proceedings, very much depreciated in value; the affairs of the company went on from bad to worse, and the whole concern was soon brought practically to an end. Their creditors here, however, thought that at all events the debentures constituted a simple debt, of which there would be no difficulty in obtaining the discharge; they brought an action, and the jury found all the facts in their favour; but the Court, after keeping all the papers a long time, pronounced, without assigning any reason for it, a decision against them. He was, moreover, informed that the Minister at Lisbon having been made acquainted with the proceedings, had arrived, with respect to the matter, at a conclusion of a most unsatisfactory character, amounting, in fact, to a denial of justice. Now, it was desirable, he thought, that Her Majesty's Government should take some notice of these transactions, particularly as it would appear that the Portuguese Government were meditating another venture in our well-stocked money market. Every opinion that had been given by the diplomatic authorities had been entirely in favour of those claimants. In consequence of representations which he had made in the last Session, the Government of Portugal had been brought so far to a sense of its duty as to pay the arrears of interest up to the middle of last year. He hoped now that they would not only pay the interest which had since accrued but also the principal, and thus bring the matter to a close. He was aware of the difficulty which Her Majesty's Government had in getting the Government of Portugal to act rightly. A few years ago he had induced Her Majesty's Government to make representations in another case of injustice, and it had taken two years to bring the Portuguese Government to do what they were bound. He hoped the Under Secretary would exhibit now the same energy which he had shown on that occasion, and he begged to conclude by moving for the papers on the subject, in order that his hon. Friend might have an opportunity of giving some explanation.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copy of the Papers relating to the claims of British Subjects in respect of the Union Mercantile Company,"—(Mr. Ayrton),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. LAYARD said, that the case to which his hon. Friend had called attention belonged to a class of cases with which it was extremely difficult to deal, and the difficulty had been rendered still greater by speeches which had been lately made in that House. He feared that Governments like the Government of Portugal were encouraged by such speeches to resist our demands. Without pledging himself to all the facts related by his hon. Friend, he believed his sketch on the whole was correct. British capitalists had been induced to invest their money in an undertaking which might to a great extent be called a Government one. That undertaking had not succeeded to the full extent, and the Government had repudiated the guarantee which it had given. An action had been brought in the Portuguese Courts, but, according to the opinion not only of our own agent but of the highest legal authorities in Portugal, there had been a gross maladministration of justice in the matter, and the English shareholders had not received fair play. Her Majesty's Government had referred the case to the Law Advisers of the Crown, and they gave it as their opinion that there were still tribunals in Portugal to which recourse might be had. As long as that was the case the Government could not make official representations. His hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), who was somewhat connected with the matter, had gone to Portugal during the year, the Foreign Office furnished him with every assistance, he had been supported by Sir A. Magenis, and on his return home it was hoped that the affair had been settled. But the Portuguese Government had first repudiated the guarantee, and next the engagements into which they had entered. Friendly representations had been made to them over and over again through Sir A. Magenis, over and over again the Portuguese Minister had promised to settle the claims, and over and over again those promises had been broken. He could wish for their own credit that the Portuguese Government would settle these claims, and, indeed, it would be for their interest to do so. This was exactly the country which could develop the resources of Portugal by supplying it with money; but it was impossible that British capitalists should lend their money as long as the Portuguese Government remained guilty of so gross a breach of faith. He could assure his hon. Friend that the Foreign Office would do all it possibly could in the matter unofficially. It could not take any official steps on account of the legal difficulties that were in the way. The Portuguese Government said there was still an appeal. Her Majesty's Government held that appeal to be hopeless, and he believed the shareholders were of the same opinion, but still they could not act upon it. After what had passed in the House that evening, he hoped the Portuguese Government would feel it a duty which they owed to their own honour to satisfy the claims which were made upon them. He had not the least objection to produce the papers.

Mr. AYRTON said, he would beg leave to withdraw the Motion. He might add that he believed the claimants had exhausted all their appeals.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

FORFEITURE OF LANDS AND GOODS BILL.—QUESTION.

Mr. CHARLES FORSTER said, as there was a general concurrence of opinion from both sides of the House in favour of the principle of the Bill, and as the Bill consisted of but one clause, he could see no reason why it could not be carried into law this Session. He wished to ask, Whether, in the event of the Order of the Day for going into Committee on the Bill being discharged, the Attorney General will be prepared to introduce it as a Government measure early in the next Session of Parliament?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the hon. Gentleman had done good service in taking up this Question, and the object he had in view was worthy of the assent of that House. Still it was not quite so simple a matter as he seemed to suppose, but must be dealt with rather more in detail than by a Bill of one clause. If the hon. Gentleman would trust the matter to him he would undertake that a Bill should be introduced next Session.

ASSIZES FOR THE WEST RIDING.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SMYTH said, he wished, in the absence of the right hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Sotherton Estcourt), who had a Motion on this subject on the paper, to ask the Government, Whether, after the next Assize for the West Riding had been held at Leeds, they would allow the question of the future Assize Town of the West Riding to be reheard in case sufficient evidence should be laid before them to justify a rehearing?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the best answer he could give was to refer the hon. and gallant Gentleman to Her Majesty's reply to the address of the other House, which referred to the terms of the Act of Parliament, and stated distinctly—as, indeed, was the case with every other assize town—that if hereafter public convenience in reference to the administration of justice should seem to require that a change should be made or an inquiry instituted, the Question should be re-considered. Of course this could be done as well in regard to the West Riding as to any other county. Leeds stood in no exceptional position—it was to the West Riding what Winchester was to Hampshire and Salisbury to Wilts, and nothing more; and according to the terms of the Act of Parliament reference might be made to the Privy Council if it were shown that a change was required in the interests of the administration of justice.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £5,184, to complete the sum for Magnetic and Meteorological Observations, &c.

Mr. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he had before objected to the weather table issued under the auspices of the Board of Trade, and he still entertained the belief that no reliance could be placed on these prophecies or forecasts of the weather which had lately appeared, and which had very rarely been verified. It was said the forecasts were based on scientific principles, but unfortunately that did not save them from being contradicted by events. About two years ago a forecast was made of an expected gale from the north. It happened, however, that the gale blew from the south, and its effects were very mischievous. In another case a gale from the south-west was prophesied, but instead of blowing on our coasts, as it was stated in the forecast it would, it visited the Baltic, and fortunately was confined to that sea. He had gone through the different tables of forecasts, and had found them twice wrong to once right. He wished to know, whether any instructions had been issued by the Admiralty that their sailing vessels should be governed by the forecasts?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he differed from the hon. Gentleman, and believed he expressed the opinion of every seafaring man in the country, when he characterized the remarks just made with respect to Admiral Fitzroy's signals as very unfair. Admiral Fitzroy never professed to prophesy exactly what the wind was going to be, but said that the system was still in its infancy, and required great development. It was, however, making progress, for every European Government was adopting it and making a comparison of observations. In reply to the Question, whether naval officers were to be governed by the weather signals, he could only say that he thought an officer would be blamed if he went to sea in spite of a bad weather signal, and caused damages to occur to his ship, unless he was under some stringent orders on no account to delay his voyage. All along the coast, the seafaring population paid great attention to the signals. His own constituents, who were upon the sea coast, had repeatedly expressed their satisfaction with the system; and he thought it would be extremely unwise, now that the system was becoming developed, suddenly to stop it.

MR. DILLWYN said, he understood that his hon. Friend did not object so much to the weather drums which were intended to indicate from what quarter a gale was coming, and which might be serviceable, as to the pretences of forecasting the weather. Those weather prophecies, he thought, did not mislead the public, for the public paid no attention to them.

Mr. Augustus Smith

These prophecies were like Ministerial answers—they might be read in a hundred different ways. He hoped his hon. Friend would divide the Committee against the Vote. The noble Lord talked of the system being in its infancy. It would be time enough to ask for a Vote when the system had attained a mature growth.

MR. LAIRD said that, being connected with a seafaring population, he could state that the weather observations were considered very important, and had been the means of saving a vast amount of life and property.

Vote agreed to,

(2.) £500, Royal Geographical Society.

(3.) £1,000, Royal Society.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £500, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for enabling the Directors of the Royal Academy of Music to provide accommodation for the Institution."

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he wished to ask for an explanation of the Vote.

MR. PEEL said, that the Royal Academy of Music had existed for thirty or forty years, during which time it had been a self-supporting institution. Its object more particularly was to afford to persons desirous of entering the musical profession an education in this country as good as on the Continent. The expenses of the Academy had been on the average of the last few years £500 a year greater than the receipts from the pupils. The deficiency was made up by voluntary subscriptions and by money derived from a sum which had been invested. That sum of money amounted originally to £10,000, but was now reduced to £4,000, so that it was obvious that if the sum went on diminishing in that way the society would have no alternative but to close their doors. Under these circumstances the society had addressed a memorial to the Chancellor of the Exchequer requesting that Parliament might be recommended to grant to the Academy a small sum, and that memorial was signed by a very long list of names, including almost every name of eminence in the musical profession. The Academy undertook to instruct teachers, and some of the most eminent professors had stated their opinion that it was worthy of support. The Vote was not proposed with the view of propping up a decayed institution, but with the object of enabling the Academy to recover itself. Under these circumstances he hoped there would be no opposition to the small sum proposed by the Government.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, the House would remember that on a recent occasion a financial lecture had been delivered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had told them that every man had his peculiar crotchet which he pressed upon the Government and Parliament, however expensive it might be to the public. There was before them at that moment an example of what the Government themselves could do in this way. That was the first time a Vote was asked for the Academy of Music. The Academy was a private one. ["No, no!"] He believed it was strictly a private Academy. In the present Session the House had put a stop to street music, which amused the people. They were now about to pay for music for the better classes. The House had degenerated into a rich man's club. The first attempt was to get £500 for the Academy of Music, but before long we would have them in a building, and when the public interests required that they should be turned out, the House would be asked for a Vote to keep them in. He could not understand how the Government could make such a proposition if they were anxious for economy. He knew the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Frederick Peel) was a musical man, that he attended concerts, and was acquainted with the Academy. Well, he also was acquainted with it; and he challenged the Chancellor of the Exchequer to produce six good singers whom it had ever produced. They did not want the Academy at the expense of the taxpayers of the country; and though the House was a thin one he hoped it would have sufficient spirit to reject the proposition. Again he challenged the Chancellor of the Exchequer to produce any person eminent either in vocal or instrumental music whom the Academy had handed down. It was nothing but an attempt on the part of a few amateurs to indulge their taste at the expense of the public; and he, therefore, moved that the Vote be rejected.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, that there could be no doubt that his hon. Friend (Mr. Osborne) was exercising a right in objecting to a new Vote proposed by the Government, and there could be no doubt that it was quite within the province of the Committee to reject the Vote; but he could not see much relevance in the other matter which his hon. Friend had introduced—namely, the demands made on the Government by private Members. The two questions were quite different from each other. However, his hon. Friend opposed the Vote on two grounds. He said the Academy was a private institution, and he further said that the proposition of a Vote of £500 would be followed by demands for larger sums. Now, with regard to the first objection he entirely denied that the Academy was a private society unless they said that all the multitude of institutions for which they voted annual sums were private societies. They might say on the same grounds that the Royal Institution and the Royal Academy were private societies. Societies for the promotion of the arts and sciences in this country did not emanate or proceed directly from the State; but still the system had been for the State to afford a moderate assistance to those institutions. His hon. Friend said that these grants always grew enormously. That he denied. By way of illustration, he would take another grant—that to the Geographical Society, which was first proposed when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer ten years ago. If any hon. Gentleman asked the question of a member of the Geographical Society he would find that it mainly owed its prosperity to the grant of £500, which had first been voted ten years ago, and had never grown. It was a truth that the culture of music in this country had extended enormously in our generation. The people of England had become conscious of the fact that the taste for music was a gift conferred on mankind generally in various degrees. With some persons it was absent altogether, but as a general rule it was an universal gift. In regard to music, as in that of other sciences, it was found that benevolent persons were disposed to promote education among the young, but were not so ready to support schools and colleges for training teachers. His hon. Friend was mistaken in thinking that the Vote was intended for the support of an institution in which a particular class of music was to be cultivated. The Academy gave no preference to English music in particular. If his hon. Friend looked at the memorial in favour of the Vote, he would find that it was signed by some of the most eminent musicians of the various schools of music. At the present time the Crown, the Royal family, and a small number of persons had the exclusive honour and burden of supporting the institution, and it appeared to him when the claim presented itself, that it was not possible to say it was an illegitimate application, having regard to other Votes which the House passed annually. It was true there was no money-Vote for the Royal Academy, but that institution had a grant of premises which was equivalent to several thousand pounds a year. Before they undertook to submit the Vote to Parliament the Government had required the society to show them that they had the confidence of the musical profession. That they had now shown by the names of the Englishmen and foreigners who supported the application. Secondly, they had required that the society should discard any intention of acting on a system of private patronage; they had required that the society should throw open their doors to all comers, and conduct the institution on the most liberal principles. To both those conditions the society had conformed. Thirdly, the Government said they could not take upon themselves the responsibility of supporting the Academy. All they could do was to apply to Parliament for an experimental Vote, and if the countenance of Parliament was the means of securing for the Academy adequate public support the grant might be continued, but the Government could not make the society public pensioners. The expenditure of the Academy was several thousands a year, and the moderate amount covered by the Vote was only applied in aid of private subscriptions, the bulk of the expense being borne by the pupils. He did not think that the House would retrace its steps and revoke the grants made that very year in behalf of kindred objects, and he hoped therefore that this Vote would also command cheerful acquiescence.

MR. AYRTON said, there was no analogy between the Academy of Music and the Geographical Society, which was essentially a public society, with public objects, whereas the Academy was merely for the purpose of giving persons a superior knowledge of music, and thereby enabling them to earn larger salaries than they otherwise could command. As to the precedents which had been referred to, every act of extravagance into which the House was inveigled by the Government, was made a precedent to justify further extravagance in some further Session. The Government seemed to be about to teach every thing to every body at the public expense, and when the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke of a maximum grant of £500, he should look to the Science and Art Department. No sooner would the grant be made in London than the provinces would ask why they should not also have a share; and Dublin and Edinburgh would make demands which could not be resisted for the establishment of schools of music there. The Kensington Museum had led to a museum at Dublin and Edinburgh, and to an expenditure of thousands for erecting, filling, and keeping up those buildings, and for a travelling museum very much like that of Barnum or Wombwell. In the memorial which had been presented, the memorialists trusted that the time was not distant when music might stand here on the same footing as in those countries where the Government wholly and permanently maintained a school of music. These persons had not arrived at the happy frame of mind which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had attained when he said that he saw the end of this expenditure. Now he (Mr. Ayrton) only saw the beginning of it. The grant was for the maintenance of music of a high character among the upper classes, who ought to be able to pay for it themselves, while they were unable to endure the organs and the humbler music of the lower classes. A more contemptible vote was never presented to Parliament, and he hoped it would be rejected.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not wish to mislead the Committee, and he would, therefore, inform them that there had been an application from Dublin founded upon the proposed grant; but the answer given was that it was an experimental proposal, and that any other application was premature. Within very moderate limits he thought it not unwise to recognize the claims of Dublin and Edinburgh in such cases. But if even the grant of £500 were supplemented by grants of £200 or £300 to those two cities, the fears of the hon. Member must be easily excited if they were aroused by the contingency of such proposals. He hoped that the hon. Gentleman would not attempt to propagate the fallacy that it was a question between the music of the higher and of the lower classes, because the music of the higher classes was the opera, and was essentially foreign music, whereas the vote applied chiefly to music enjoyed by the middle classes, especially in London.

MR. CLAY said, that even if the consequences foreseen by the hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton) were realized, and the provinces obtained a share in the grants made for purposes of art, he could not say that any harm would be done by the softening influences of art being felt all over the country. The hon. Gentleman said that the object of the Academy of Music was to enable people to make money. That was not so. Its object was to improve the taste and increase the knowledge of music throughout the country; and if some persons thereby gained a higher position than they would otherwise have obtained, that was a mere accident, and was not the original aim and intention of the Academy. He remembered the time when nothing beyond hunting and drinking songs were known as English compositions, and when one opera, Artaxerxes, represented the English school. Things had now changed, and we had a musical school not inferior to that of any country, which result was mainly owing to the influence of the Royal Academy of Music.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he did not know whether it was competent to him to move a similar grant for Dublin, but if it were, he would do so, and an hon. Friend was equally ready to propose a Vote for Edinburgh.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he wished to know if the science of music was to be encouraged by a grant of public money where was the system to end? He thought that the less Government had to do with such institutions the better it would be for everybody. Formerly agriculture and fisheries were sustained by public money, but since the grants had ceased neither agriculture nor the fisheries had been less productive. If any Government management were to be given to any particular science, he thought it would be most usefully given to a school of cookery, as there was no country in the world in which the proverb, "Providence sends food and the devil cooks," was more verified than in England.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE reminded the hon. and gallant Member for Portarlington (Colonel Dunne) that it was complained that Ireland was suffering from a pressure of taxation. The hon. and gallant Gentleman wished for additional expenditure, because additional expenditure was proposed for England. But increased expenditure meant increased taxation, although it might be well for a rich country to bear the increased taxation, yet it would bear more hardly upon a poor and suffering country like Ireland. He would be sorry to impede the spread of musical taste and knowledge, but he was disinclined to support that new Vote.

COLONEL DUNNE explained, that he did not desire to increase expenditure, but what he complained of was, that while Ireland had too much of the taxation, she had too little of the expenditure.

MR. DILLWYN said, he could not see the analogy which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had drawn between the grant for the Academy of Music and the grant made to the Royal Academies, the Geographical Society, and the Royal Society. With respect to the Royal Academy, they had the benefit of a public building, for the use of which they drew an immense revenue, and yet were found resisting the demands of the country. The grant for the Geographical Society was for a public purpose—the exhibition of their collection of maps. The Royal Society received a grant of £1,000 to carry on certain experiments for public purposes. The Vote could not be said to be of an analogous character, and therefore he should oppose it. It was in the continuance of a system by which they were very fast assuming a paternal character and educating the whole nation. He thought it would be much better to leave the people to their own voluntary efforts.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he thought the principle upon which such rules as that they were discussing might be justified was this—that in some things the natural demands of the people were not so vigorous as they ought to be for the interests of the nation, and those demands were particularly connected with the fine arts. In those cases the State, or those who represented it, were justified in giving public money in the interests of the people for the purpose of stimulating a demand which, when it once became natural, would be beneficial to the nation. On that ground they justified the Vote for science and art, and the result had proved the justness of the principles upon which that Vote was proposed; for notoriously the taste of the country had been stimulated, and the designs of our manufactures raised, and the consequence had been a great pecuniary benefit (even to put it on that ground) to the country at large. The question was whether music should be treated upon the same footing as other arts, and he thought that it ought; and that if the Vote were rejected they should in consistency withdraw the other Votes which were given for the encouragement of science and art. The principle which had been acted upon was to give public money where it was felt that an artificial stimulus was required to promote a particular object.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE observed, that if the principle of the right hon. Gentleman were adopted, the Vote before the Committee would be only the thin end of the wedge, and before long they would be asked to vote for music schools all over the country. The Academy of Music was a private society started forty-four years ago by the Earl of Westmoreland and other noblemen and gentlemen, under the patronage of George IV., but till now not a sixpence of the public money had been voted for it. It appeared, however, that the subscriptions of the patrons had fallen off considerably; and hence the appeal which was made on behalf of a bankrupt private society. For his own part he should have been content with Ariaceraes even (to which, by the way, the hon. Gentleman had not done justice) rather than have this false system of Government aid established. There was a beautiful air in that opera, "In infancy our hopes and fears." Well, the Vote was in its infancy, and they had better crush its hopes at once. He held that the State ought not to pay for more than the mere rudiments of education. If they had a Vote for music, why not for dancing? An enthusiastic dancer once undertook to prove that all the orations of Cicero and Demosthenes might be represented by dancing, and there was a great deal to be said for the art. Some day they might have the Chancellor of the Exchequer institute an analogy between the Geographical Society and the Academy of Dancing. If the House was not a more rich man's club they would put a stopper on that stimulating process at once.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that while the hon. Member for Swansea declared that all these things should be left to voluntary effort, the hon. Member for Liskeard showed that voluntary effort had in this case been at work for forty-four years, and could go on no longer. There was surely some inconsistency in these views. He believed the Government had done right in proposing the Vote to a society which had contributed greatly to the improvement of a national taste for music.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that if there was one art or science more than another which could stand by itself and did not require the aid of Government, it was music. There had been of late years an immense advance in musical taste in this country, and there was no art more popular. It was in no need of a miserable Vote of £500, and he hoped the Committee would reject it.

MR. HENNESSY said, he must protest against the Chancellor of the Exchequer offering to Ireland the prospect of a paltry grant in aid of music when everything in the country had gone to rack and ruin through his mismanagement. What they wanted was something practical.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Member had mistaken what he said.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER thought that the knowledge of music was in such a condition in this country that improvement was highly desirable; and he protested against the time of the Committee being wasted in discussing a Vote which was so small as to have scarcely any effect upon the expenditure of the country.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 42: Majority 10.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £771,473, Customs (Salaries and Expenses).

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask how it was that there was an increase in the Vote this year of upwards of £17,000? There was strong reason to believe that the Reports of imports and exports were not correct, that there were no accurate data upon the subject, and he wanted to hear from the President of the Board of Trade what was the machinery by which the Returns were obtained, and whether he would undertake to show that the monthly and annual Returns, especially of exports, were accurate?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he believed there was no reason to doubt the general accuracy of the Returns. The imports with regard to quantity were ascertained from the entries made and also from information supplied by the dock authorities. He believed it was the practice of the Customs to compute the value of the imports from the prices of the various articles according to the price current of the day. As to the exports, in the case of quantity the bill of lading on which the duty was formerly levied was no longer required, but there was a Customs bill of lading shown by those who unloaded the ships to the Customs officers at the dock gates. The value of the exports must depend in a great degree upon the declaration of the merchants, but he had no doubt that they gave a very fair and accurate account. He believed that there was no reason to doubt the general accuracy of the Returns made by the Customs of the imports and exports of the country.

MR. PEEL said, the increase in the Vote of £17,000 was purely nominal with the exception of a sum of £4,600, which arose from a small addition to the Customs establishment in the course of last year.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £1,313,467, Inland Revenue (Salaries and Expenses).

(7.) £2,114,616, Post Office (Salaries and Expenses).

(8.) £492,536, Superannuations, &c., Customs, Inland Revenue, and Post Office.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY expressed himself dissatisfied with the explanation given by the President of the Board of Trade upon the Customs Votes. He should not have raised the question if there had not been evidence on the table that the Returns were very inaccurate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that in 1860 the Government proposed that a certain charge should be levied on bills of lading for exports, mainly with a view of giving the Customs authorities power to obtain very precise and accurate statistics with respect to goods exported. A great deal of complaint, however, was made by the trade on that subject, and a Committee reported that the old mode of obtaining such statistical information was sufficient for its purpose.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, the real question was, whether the President of the Board of Trade could pledge himself that the statement he had made about the existing machinery for collecting this information was a correct one, and whether the right hon. Gentleman himself could rely in any way upon that machinery?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he had stated that they took the declaration of the merchants as to value.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he wished the right hon. Gentleman to explain more explicitly what was the exact machinery by which the value and quantities of exports were ascertained.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he would beg before he did that to be permitted to make further inquiry. They had not the same means of ascertaining such particulars in regard to exports as they had in regard to imports; and in the case of the former they placed reliance on the declaration of the exporter.

MR. WHITE said, he could himself testify to the absolute inaccuracy of the Board of Trade Returns, especially in respect to non-dutiable articles. Some merchants were in the habit of declaring goods at double their true value, and very often gross exaggeration took place. At the same time, as the merchants had no more interest in misrepresenting in one year than they had in another, these Returns afforded a rough means of estimating the progress of our trade.

Vote agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.—REPORT.

Resolutions [July 14] reported.

In answer to Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he expected that a portion of these bonds would be paid off next year.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY inquired the rate of interest on the bonds.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the rate of interest would be specified in the Bill.

Resolutions agreed to.

SCOTTISH EPISCOPAL CLERGY DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.

CUBA SLAVE TRADE.—PETITION.

LORD BROUGHAM, in rising to present to their Lordships a Petition from certain Inhabitants of Kingston, Jamaica, praying for the Suppression of the Slave Trade, said, he would not make a promise to detain them a short time, because that promise, often made, was never kept, but would engage only to occupy so much as was absolutely necessary of their time by the importance of the subject and the facts he had to state. He hoped they would bear with him when he said that in a Parliamentary life of much above half a century there was nothing on which he looked back with such satisfaction as his having been enabled to pass the Act treating the slave traffic, not as a trade or contraband, but as what it really was, a crime of a grave description, and punished it as it deserved; and also his having, with their Lordships' concurrence and that of the Colonial Legislatures, shortened the three years, the period of apprenticeship, substituted by the Act of 1834 for slavery as an intermediate state before entire emancipation. He rejoiced to say that the Act of 1811 had effectually relieved this country from all share in the crime, for it had only in one or two instances been found necessary to enforce it; and as for the poor slaves, they had shown by their peaceful demeanour how well they deserved entire freedom, there never having been a breach of the peace in all our colonies. They also had shown by their subsequent conduct how well disposed they were to benefit by their freedom, of which an example was afforded in a petition two or three years ago from a public meeting in Jamaica, attended only by freed slaves; the petition was signed by 800 of these poor people, and of the whole only two signed with a mark, the whole 798 having learnt to write and signed their names. He had now to complain of the manner in which the Spanish Government had set at naught the treaty they had entered into, by continuing to sell slaves. He was not one of those who held that it does not become this country to interfere on any account with anything going on in a foreign country. There were cases in which it was not only honourable in this country to do so, but when it was a matter of duty for it to interfere. There must either be a treaty binding us, or else such peril to the universal peace of European society as in the end might affect us; but that there should never be interference he was not prepared to say. Here was a case in which interference was called for not only by humanity and justice, not only to relieve millions of our fellow creatures from undeserved and cruel bondage, not only to free the great continent of Africa which was now crippled and held down by the remains of this detestable traffic, but by the direct and most important interest of our fellow countrymen in the West Indies. The noble and learned Lord then pointed out the systematic manner in which Spain, in the face of treaties, had from 1817 to the present time not only permitted but fostered that traffic; the importation or diminution of importation of slaves into Cuba depending not on the action of the Spanish Government, but on the personal character of the Governor of that colony. While not desiring to advocate anything like a return to the principles of protection, he believed that the only effectual way for this country to check the slave trade would be to place a heavy duty on slave-grown sugar from Spanish colonies. In urging that a higher duty should be imposed on the slave-grown sugar of Cuba and other colonies than on our own free-grown sugar he had been supported by his three excellent and lamented Friends—Alexander Baring (the first Lord Ashburton), Lord Chief Justice Denman, and the great Duke, that illustrious man whose irreparable loss was deeply deplored every day and every hour, both in war and in peace, and all questions whether of foreign or domestic policy. His advice was surely fit to be followed by Spain, which to him owed, as an independent state, her very existence; but he never would have recalled to her recollection these obligations, for his great mind held the maxim that the giver of favours could not have too short a memory, or the receiver too long. But we might urge his advice, and pursue the policy he recommended, if on no other, yet on the ground of the immense services he had rendered to Spain. The conduct of Brazil contrasted most favourably with that of Spain in this matter, the slave trade to the former country having been suppressed; and there was now a strong case for repealing the Aberdeen Act.

EARL RUSSELL said, that every one must acknowledge the great services which the noble and learned Lord had rendered to the cause of the abolition of slavery; but there was here a difficulty which the noble and learned Lord did not seem to recognize. When this country had arrived at the conviction that the slave trade ought to be put an end to, and an Act was passed to that effect, the British Government had to deal with its own officers and its own colonies, and the trade was therefore entirely suppressed; but when we had to deal with Foreign Governments and officers, over whom we had no control, difficulties arose. Every Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in recent times had been compelled to address protests and remonstrances to Foreign Governments; still, we never had been able to secure the object of the entire abolition of the slave trade. The Spanish Government always professed to be willing to carry out the treaty; but owing to the strength of private interests in Cuba, and the consequent unwillingness of the Spanish Government to offend those who had an interest in maintaining the slave trade in that Island, we never had been able to obtain efficacious aid from that Government in the suppression of the traffic in negroes. He concurred in the tribute which his noble and learned Friend had paid to the present Governor; but he believed that that functionary had found private interests too strong for him. He doubted whether the differential duty suggested by his noble and learned Friend as a remedy would be effective for the object which he had in view, as slave-grown sugar from Cuba would still be received in France, Spain, Russia, and other European countries, and therefore the effect of a differential duty would be very small. Having on a recent occasion spoken in reference to Brazil, he did not think it necessary to make any further remarks on that empire.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he willingly bore testimony to the great efforts of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Brougham) to secure the entire abolition of slavery, but he thought the noble Earl opposite (Earl Russell) would bear him out when he said that private interest was exerted to keep up the slave trade in Brazil. The Government, however, were not to blame, for it had been exerting itself as much as possible to stop the traffic. Under these circumstances he felt that the condemnation cast upon the Brazilian Government in another place by the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government was calculated unjustly to wound the feelings of that Government. He now wished to repeat what he had told their Lordships on a former occasion, that the time had arrived, or nearly arrived, when Lord Aberdeen's Act might be done away with. In the last conversation he had with the late Earl of Aberdeen, that noble Earl said that the time had arrived when it would afford him great pleasure to see the Act repealed.

LORD BROUGHAM expressed his opinion, that the Act of the United States Government giving us the right of search was a most important one. He believed that in the course of the next two months events at the other side of the Atlantic would render it expedient, and if expedient desirable, for England and France to use their good offices in endeavouring to put an end to that cruel war between the North and South which every friend of humanity must deplore.

METROPOLITAN DISTRICT RAILWAYS BILL.

(QUEEN'S CONSENT SIGNIFIED.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. CRAWFORD, on behalf of the City of London, objected to the further progress of the Bill. It was one of a class of Bills which the corporation of London felt it their duty to take exception to at a very early period of the Session. The Bill was not one promoted by any authorized Company, but was promoted by certain individuals for the purpose of making a railway along the Thames Embankment and the new street to Cannon Street, and from thence, by tunnelling, to the Tower. The corporation objected to the proposal to carry the railway from Cannon Street, and they also objected to it because it was intended by this Private Bill to deprive the City Gas Company of certain rights which had been reserved to it by the Thames Embankment Act, which was a public Act. They further said that the merits of the Bill had not been duly considered by the Select Committee, three days only having been devoted to it. They objected also to it on account of its dealing with a vast amount of private property; and as the railway would pass under substantial buildings in one of the most crowded parts of the City, great danger was likely to result from the undertaking, unless further examination and inquiry were afforded. They represented, that so far from this undertaking relieving the streets from their present enormous traffic, it would increase it, and therefore it was an unwise and an unnecessary thing to allow the railway to be made. Already the streets, especially Fleet Street, were blocked up with vehicles, owing to the gigantic works that were now being carried out in the City of London, so that it was a great inconvenience to those who had business in the City, in consequence of the delay that took place from the over-crowding of Fleet Street; and they said that that obstruction might be indefinitely increased if this gigantic work was allowed to be carried out at the same time. Moreover, they said that the Bill, if carried, would deprive the City Gas Company from having their 50,000 tons of coal, which they consumed annually, brought by water, and they would be compelled to obtain it, to a considerable extent, by carting it through the streets. The objection would not be so great to the Bill if the proposed line stopped at Cannon Street, and the corporation asked for time in order that the House might consider an alternative plan propounded by the City for connecting the embankment with the London, Dover, and Chatham Railway at Blackfriars. The promoters of the Bill were entitled to no commiseration. There was no company in the case—the scheme was the property of a well known Parliamentary solicitor and equally well-known railway contractors, who had complied with the Standing Orders of the House by depositing borrowed money; and he complained that the Select Committee had not directed the attention of the House to the fact of its not being a bond fide scheme. He moved that the Bill be read the third time that day month.

MR. GOSCHEN seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day month."—(Mr. Crawford.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member for the City had in his speech mixed up two questions—one, the question of Order; and the other, the merits of the Bill. That was a somewhat inconvenient course, and he asked the hon. Member whether it would not be better to get rid of the first objection before entering on the merits of the Bill.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he would adopt that course.

MR. SPEAKER, having recited the provisions of the Bill, said, that as there was an exact case in point, where the City of Bristol by a Private Act repealed certain provisions in a public Act, this Bill could not be stopped on a point of Order.

MR. AYRTON said, that if the Bill were thrown out the inhabitants of the metropolis, with the exception of the City corporation, would be greatly prejudiced, and he expressed a hope that the House would not listen to the opposition of the corporation. The proposed line formed part of a complete system of circular metropolitan railways, which it was desirable should be carried out for the benefit of the whole of the metropolis, and a most inconvenient gap would be created in the system if this Bill should be thrown out.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that the majority of merchants, bankers, and traders of London, as well as the corporation, were opposed to this Bill. He might say that all who had business in the City were opposed to it.

LORD STANLEY said, that the promoters of the Bill had proposed certain compensations and arrangements with the Gas Company, with which the Company were perfectly satisfied. So far from the 50,000 tons of coal consumed annually by the Gas Company impeding the traffic of the streets, there was no difficulty in foreseeing that it would be brought by railways. It was true the line was laid out for passenger traffic only, but there was no reason why they should not carry their coal at nights. He believed it was the plan of all railways to carry their goods traffic on at night. At all events, he thought he might venture to say that but little of the 50,000 tons of coal would come on the streets of London. It had been objected that the Bill had not been brought in by a company, but by individuals. But, with regard to these Private Bills, he apprehended all Parliament had to do was to consider whether the scheme was one likely to prove beneficial to the public, and not with reference to the promoters, and he never knew of any difficulty in finding money for a line that was likely to pay. The principal objection to the Bill really was, the amount of property that would be destroyed in its construction. He was not surprised at the general feeling that prevailed early in the Session with reference to the land required for the different schemes in the City, but there was far greater fear than knowledge on the subject, arising from a belief that all the land scheduled must be taken and occupied by the railways. Of the four schemes, two had been rejected, and one had been considerably curtailed. In reality the amount of property to be taken by this gigantic undertaking, as it had been called, was 197 houses, all of which, with the exception of 19, would be rebuilt when the works were completed. He was rather surprised that the hon. Member for the City had not mentioned what the present Bill proposed to do for the relief of the obstruction of the streets. The railway would also be carried out in such a way that its construction would be coincident with that of the drainage works, which otherwise must be carried under Cannon Street, and thus any interference with that important thoroughfare would be prevented. The reason why the Bill did not occupy the Committee so long as the others was, that they had already considered substantially the same questions. He wished to say one word with respect to the alternative plan which had been put forward by the corporation. He confessed that he was distrustful of alternative plans which were put forward by parties who were not bound to execute them, and which were often started at the last moment more in order to hold out some sort of expectation to the Committee, than if the scheme before them was rejected some other one would be adopted, rather than with a view to any actual operations. He objected to that alternative plan, in the first place, because it would interfere with a great deal of very valuable property not touched by the line which the Committee had passed; and he objected to it, in the second place, because it would place the City on a branch line instead of including it in the main line. He should add that the general plan of an inner circle had been suggested by the Lords' Committee of 1863, and had received the sanction of the Joint Committee of both Houses which sat this year. In conclusion, he had to state that he believed no other scheme would give so much accommodation to the trade of London with so small an interference with the street traffic or with private property as the one embodied in the Bill.

Mr. Speaker

As the other House would have the opportunity of considering the Bill, and of hearing what its opponents had to say, he hoped the House would not reject it at this the last stage, but allow it to go where argument and evidence could be heard on both sides, and where the objections entertained to it could be fairly weighed.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, that every person with whom he had conversed upon the subject entertained the belief that it would be most unwise for the present to bring more railways into the heart of London. He did not see how the other House could give this Bill proper consideration at this period of the Session; and all that the opponents of the Motion before the House asked was that the question should be again considered in another Session.

MR. SCOURFIELD drew attention to the fact that the promoters of this Bill had made a deposit of stock borrowed for the occasion, a proceeding which a Select Committee had just pronounced to be an evasion of the spirit if not of the letter of the Standing Orders. Under all the circumstances of the case, he thought the House ought not then to pass the measure.

MR. MASSEY said, that this particular scheme had been considered both by the Joint Committee of Lords and Commons and by the Committee of that House presided over by the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), and the noble Lord's name was a sufficient guarantee that the duties of the Committee had been efficiently performed. Two important bodies, the corporation of London and the Metropolitan Board of Works, represented by able counsel, had opposed the line, but without convincing the Committee that it was a bad one. It was for the other House, and not for them, to say whether or not the subject could be properly investigated before the Session closed. As to the deposit of borrowed money, although a Select Committee had condemned the practice, he was sure it was not intended, and would be rather hard, to give retrospective effect to the recommendation of the Committee, especially as the practice had been tacitly acquiesced in by the House for some years. As the opponents of the Bill would be able to state their case in the other House, he saw no reason why that House should reverse the decision of their Committee, and hoped the Bill would be read a third time.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, that he had been a Member of the Committee, and had gone into it with opinions rather averse to the scheme embodied in the Bill; but the evidence which had been adduced subsequently led him to the conclusion that it was the very best which had been devised for meeting the requirements of metropolitan traffic.

MR. TITE believed that the amount of injury done by this railway to the City would be much less than was supposed, but he thought it would be wise to postpone the Bill until next Session, when they would have had the opportunity of seeing the progress of other works.

Question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3^d, and passed.

PUBLIC OFFICES—SATURDAY HALF HOLIDAY.—QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government will give their favourable consideration to the propriety of extending to all the other public offices the Saturday Half Holiday, which has long prevailed to a certain extent in the Audit and some other Offices, and which, as the Secretary to the Treasury has stated, has been granted to the Post Office, without entailing on the public inconvenience or expense?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, this was a Question of some importance to the public service, and without communication with the heads of Departments he was unable to answer the Question of the hon. Gentleman.

UNITED STATES—SEIZURE OF THE BARQUE "SCIENCE."

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can state if any decision has been come to by the Government of the United States of America respecting the seizure some months since of the barque Science, of Waterford, at Matamoras, by a Federal ship of war?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that by the last accounts from the United States they had heard that the Science had been released, but they had received no particulars as to whether damages or compensation had been awarded.

TRAFFIC OF THE CITY OF LONDON.

QUESTION.

LORD ERNEST BRUCE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the provisions of an Act of Parliament, which received the Royal Assent on the 28th of July, 1863, intituled "An Act for the better Regulation of the Traffic in the Streets of the City of London, and for the prevention of obstructions therein," are likely to be carried into effect; whether Colonel Fraser, the City Commissioner of Police, did not several months ago send in a proposed set of Rules, Orders, and Regulations, approved of by the City Law Officers, for the approbation of the Secretary of State, and what has been the cause of so long a delay?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that he had previously stated the cause of the delay in bringing these traffic regulations into operation. Colonel Fraser had no authority in the matter, but the Court of Aldermen, having power by law to make regulations for the traffic, had transmitted to him, through the town clerk, some months ago, a series of regulations which they had made, in order that they might receive his sanction. He had referred those regulations for the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, who reported that some of them were in excess of the powers vested by law in the Court of Aldermen. He had accordingly sent them back, and on Tuesday last he received, through the town clerk, a revised set of regulations, which appeared to be free from all legal objection. He had, therefore, given them his sanction, and they would at once come into operation.

TREATY OF VIENNA AND PRUSSIA.

QUESTION.

MR. AYRTON said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a Question respecting the territorial guarantee contained in the Treaty of Vienna. He wished to know, Whether any representations have been made on the part of this country to Prussia to the effect, that if Prussia insists upon departing from the Treaty which settled the limits and conditions of the Germanic Confederation, the British Government will not hold itself further bound by that guarantee?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: No communication has been made of that nature to the Prussian Government, and I do not think it would be expedient to follow the example of Prussia. That country having in the beginning of the Danish difficulties declared that she might repudiate the Treaty of 1852, in consequence of Denmark not having fulfilled some of her obligations which were totally independent of that treaty, we should have no right to tell Prussia that we are absolved from the Treaty of Vienna on account of another transaction taking place in 1863 or 1864.

ARMY—EXPERIMENTS WITH RIFLED ORDNANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. J. A. SMITH said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether there would be any objection to lay before the House a Letter addressed to Earl De Grey by Mr. Alfred Jeffery on the 29th of April last in reference to his Correspondence with the War Office, and the results of his experiments with Rifled Ordnance since July, 1854?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, there would be no objection on the part of the War Office to lay on the table the Correspondence which had taken place between that Department and Mr. Jeffery if the hon. Member thought fit to press for it, but there would be some inconvenience in producing an isolated letter from that Correspondence. He might, however, state the opinion entertained with regard to Mr. Jeffery's inventions. Mr. Jeffery, as long ago as July, 1854, submitted a specimen of his compound shot to the Government, which very shortly afterwards determined to institute experiments with projectiles on Mr. Jeffery's principle, and also to place at his disposal guns to be rifled on any system which he might think best adapted for carrying his projectiles. Experiments with cast-iron guns had been conducted and brought to a conclusion, and there had been further experiments with his projectiles from wrought-iron guns. More importance had always been attached to Mr. Jeffery's projectiles than to any system of rifling which he had brought forward. The Ordnance Committee had given it as their opinion that Mr. Jeffery had succeeded in the objects which he originally proposed to himself—namely, that he had effected a mechanical junction between the two metals, iron and lead. They also thought that Mr. Jeffery was the first to propose a very slow twist in guns. Yet no practical result had been attained, because the Ordnance Committee had not deemed it their duty to recommend that Mr. Jeffery's system should be adopted in the service; but it was by no means impossible that at some future time some part of his inventions might be adopted. The Ordnance Committee had on all occasions borne willing testimony to the public-spirited motives which appeared to have actuated Mr. Jeffery in his transactions with that Department, and to the fair and open manner in which he had always acted; and the Secretary of State for War was quite prepared to concur in that opinion of the Committee.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—THE TREATY OF LONDON (1852).—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would beg to ask, What Her Majesty's Government deemed to be the present position of the Treaty of 1852, and whether they held it to be still in force?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The position of that treaty is like the position of any other treaty, the conditions of which have been found practically not to be capable of being strictly enforced. All the contracting parties to that treaty have been sharing in negotiations, the object of which was to modify it. It is perfectly competent for those who make a treaty, if after the lapse of time its conditions are not applicable to existing circumstances, to agree to a modification of that treaty; and that was the result of the Conferences which were lately held in London. The position of this treaty is, therefore, like that of any other treaty in which the parties who signed it are willing by common consent to make some modification.

MR. ARNOLD, POLICE MAGISTRATE.

EXPLANATION.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he desired to explain that Mr. Arnold, the Police Magistrate, thought the statement he had made the other night in answer to the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) was calculated to throw blame upon him. He wished, therefore, to say that he had desired to cast no blame whatever upon Mr. Arnold. He had merely intended to convey that Mr. Arnold had not represented to the Secretary of State or the Commissioners of Police that the conduct of a Police Constable to whom he had made reference required investigation. Mr. Arnold said that his usual course in such cases was to make a verbal communication, but he thought that, where the conduct of a Police Constable was concerned, it was desirable that the Magistrate's opinion should be recorded in writing, together with the grounds on which it was based.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to ask whether Police Magistrates were to be expected to make these communications to the Home Office respecting the misconduct of the Police when, as had happened he believed in three instances, they had previously done so in vain?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was not aware that the fact was as stated by the hon. Gentleman. All he could say was, that if the conduct of a constable required to be brought under the notice of the Commissioners of Police, it ought to be done in writing and not by a verbal statement, which might be inaccurately reported.

POLITICAL RELATIONS WITH BRAZIL.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE rose, pursuant to notice, to call attention to the state of our political relations with Brazil, and said, Sir, I feel that some apology is due not only to the House but to the immense commercial interests which are affected—to the owners of Brazilian stock, and to all who are engaged in commercial intercourse with the Empire of Brazil, that some apology is due for my bringing on this subject at the eleventh hour to a fatigued House, exhausted by the labours of the Session. But if the House is exhausted by its labours, I think it is bound to remember the great issues which are at stake in the question of the unsatisfactory relations which have for a long period existed, and which still exist, between this country and the Empire of Brazil. The question is so important that I think even the Chancellor of the Exchequer would do well to interrupt his private conversation, and to listen to what is now going on—because it materially affects the credit and responsibility of Her Majesty's Ministers, as I will show presently. The case of our relations with Brazil at this moment may be put shortly. I believe the Empire of Brazil is the one isolated example in the civilized world, of a State with which we have numerous transactions of various kinds, with which we have not a single commercial treaty or a treaty of any kind except the Convention of 1826. I hope the House will give me its attention while I state the nature of our transactions with Brazil. I find the commerce carried on between this country and Brazil amounts to not less than £12,000,000 a year. I find that the Brazilian debt held in this country amounts to nearly £9,000,000. Moreover, there are three English companies engaged in making railways in Brazil, which have guarantees for upwards of £5,000,000 of capital. Added to these three companies are various other companies, composed entirely of Englishmen, and employing English labour, who have undertaken not only to drain the capital but to light the towns, to work the mines, and to perform other operations in that country. There is a numerous English population scattered all over the country, and yet that population is not secured in its property, nor protected in person by any sort of treaty. That fact must at once strike the House as a state of things which is so peculiar that we are entitled to ask how it has been brought about, and why it is allowed to continue by Her Majesty's Government? What is the cause of this entire absence of treaties? The cause, I am unfortunately obliged to say, is to be found in that meddling, mischievous policy which is never content unless it is interfering with small States and subjecting them to insult and to injustice. That policy in the case of Brazil has not only been tyrannical towards her, but has been mischievous in its effects upon England. Without going into a history of all our transactions with Brazil, I may say that there can be no doubt that from 1822 to 1844 Brazil was in such a state, owing to the weakness of her finances and the weakness of her Executive, that the slave trade was carried on to an enormous extent; but I am prepared to maintain that from the period when Brazil became altogether independent, the policy of that empire has been essentially anti-slave-trade. A very remarkable fact occurs by which I will prove that assertion. It is proved by what is called the Convention of 1826. In that Convention were incorporated the slave treaties we had made with Portugal, whereby the right of search was given, and the power of adjudication by mixed Commissions. But besides that there was a most unexampled provision in that Convention—one which, I believe, was never introduced in any slave trade treaty with any other Power. It is that stipulation which is at the bottom of all the bad feeling which has been generated in Brazil towards us. By that provision, if Brazilian citizens were found to be engaged in the slave trade, the Brazilian Government engaged to treat them as guilty of piracy. Such a provision exists in no other treaty, but the Brazilians yielded that concession to us, and proved by adhering to it that their policy was anti-slavery, and in utter opposition to the traffic in slaves. That provision was in force from March, 1830, to March, 1845, when so strong was the public feeling in Brazil against our exercise of the right of search—which had been tremendously abused by the English Government—so great was the public discontent that the Government of Brazil was forced to give it up, and to notify to the English Government that the adoption of the Portuguese treaties, as far as they were applicable to Brazil, must cease. The English Government accepted that notice, and the arrangement terminated in 1845, and then no other stipulation remained but the first article of the Convention of 1826. Lord Aberdeen's Government was then, I believe, in power. And here let me say that, in speaking of Lord Aberdeen, I can never do so in this House or elsewhere without doing justice to his intrinsic probity, his honesty, and his good intentions. Lord Aberdeen was induced to get the Parliament of that date to pass an Act, the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 122, called the Aberdeen Act. That Act authorized British cruisers to seize Brazilian ships upon suspicion of being employed in the slave trade, and to carry them before British Vice Admiralty Courts for condemnation. That must strike the House as a most extraordinary provision. That provision, however, was extensively put in force. Innumerable vessels were seized and were sent before the Vice Admiralty Court at St. Helena—acts which naturally produced a very bad feeling in Brazil against this country. When that Act was discussed in this House, who was the man who spoke loudest against it? The man who more than any other

opposed the Act was a man who had been Attorney General, and who afterwards became Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and ultimately Lord High Chancellor—Sir Thomas Wilde. He said, in effect, that so illegal, so monstrous was the Act that it was impossible England could ever inflict it upon any country but one which was unable to resist. That was the opinion of Sir Thomas Wilde, the Lord High Chancellor of the Whig Government. Another great Whig ornament of the House also spoke loudly against the Act, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Milner Gibson). I wish he would now bring his influence to bear upon his noble Friend at the head of the Government, and would now use those glowing words which he used on that former occasion. If he would do that he would be doing much towards restoring amicable relations between this country and Brazil. That right hon. Gentleman not only resisted that measure, but he brought forward an express Motion and divided the House upon it. At that period large cargoes of slaves were being landed in Brazil. If at that time he thought the Act was unjust, what does the right hon. Gentleman say now, when, as I will show, the slave trade is extinct? and how can he reconcile it to himself to sit cheek by jowl with the noble Lord who insists upon retaining that Act? But Lord Aberdeen never meant that Act to be permanent. We have had so much of blue-books lately that I will not trouble the House by making many references, but I must refer to one despatch. When Lord Aberdeen notified the passing of this Act to the Brazilian Government, what did he say? In a despatch dated the 2nd of June, 1845, Lord Aberdeen said—

“Her Majesty’s Government are far from wishing this mode of adjudicating vessels shall be permanent. They will be ready, as soon as any measures of the Brazilian Government shall enable them to do so, to recommend to Parliament to repeal the Act.”

That was an express pledge given to the Brazilian Government that if they then adopted measures tending to the extinction of the slave trade, Parliament should be invited to repeal the Act as soon as the circumstances justified such a course. I think even the noble Lord will not deny that that was an express promise. Brazil received this Act—a weak State—a State which could be experimentalized upon by the policy of the noble Lord, having no navy and no means of defence. What could Brazil do? It did all it could do. It protested against this Act as an infraction of the law of nations—and in that the Brazilians were fortified by the opinion of Sir Thomas Wilde—and they refused altogether to enter into any commercial treaty with this country until that Act was repealed. The protest was treated as all protests are by our Government from States which have not Armstrong guns to enforce them. Not content with the Act as hitherto carried out by our cruisers, who had only attacked Brazilian vessels which were suspected when they were found on the high seas on the coast of Brazil, the noble Lord in 1850 actually ordered our cruisers to carry their operations still further, and to do an act which he believed had never been done before under similar circumstances—he ordered them to invade Brazilian ports and to cut out the suspected vessels even when in the Brazilian ports and waters. This system continued for two years; and this measure created the greatest ill feeling in Brazil towards the English. Did we succeed by what I will term this legislative piracy in stopping the slave trade? The feeling of the Brazilians was very strong against the slave trade—for I beg to call the attention of the House to the fact, that that trade was carried on not by the Brazilians themselves but by foreign capitalists and adventurers, chiefly Americans, Spaniards, and Portuguese, but in some instances—at least, so it has been whispered—by Liverpool merchants. The Brazilians, however, were so much disgusted with the meddling policy of this country towards them that, instead of supporting us by measures in their Chamber, they took no steps to aid in putting down the slave trade. Subsequently, however, the greatest exertions were made by the Brazilian Government to put down the traffic, and with such success that even the noble Lord now at the head of the Government wrote as fellows to Lord Howden, our Ambassador at Madrid, on the 15th of May, 1851, enclosing a copy of the Brazilian laws, and holding up Brazil as an example to the Spanish and Portuguese Governments. These are the noble Lord’s words—

“No reasonable doubt can be now entertained, that if this same system is energetically pursued for another twelve months the slave trade to the Brazils will be almost entirely extinguished.”

So great were the exertions of the Brazilian Government, and so great their success, that in April, 1852, I find that Lord Malmesbury, then our Foreign Minister, withdrew the order for British cruisers to enter the Brazilian ports and waters, which was given by the noble Lord in 1850; and I must say that the conduct of Lord Malmesbury, at all events, in connection with his management of our affairs with Brazil, reflected great credit upon him, although it has been the fashion of hon. Members sitting upon the Ministerial side of the House to cast much abuse upon him. In consequence of that order British cruisers ceased to invade Brazilian ports and waters, and a better state of things soon arose. The Brazilian Chambers, sensible of the kindness and conciliating disposition by which the conduct of the noble Earl had been dictated, redoubled their efforts to suppress the slave trade. In 1853, a Committee, the Chairman of which, I believe, was the late Mr. Hume, and on which were the hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) and the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), came to the conclusion that it would be right, in consequence of the great exertions of the Brazilian Government for the suppression of the traffic, to consider the propriety of repealing an Act which was still regarded as so obnoxious. Since 1852, so successful has been the policy of the Brazilian Government, in consequence of the measures carried by Lord Malmesbury and the conciliating tone of the noble Lord's despatches, that the slave trade had virtually ceased by 1856. I think there were only two attempts to run slave cargoes between those years. One of those cases occurred, I believe, in 1852, when an English ship was taken by a Brazilian cruiser in Brazilian waters. The captain and crew of that ship were severely punished, and all the slaves liberated. But there was still another case which I know will be adduced, and to which, as I wish to avoid nothing, I will refer. In 1853 a ship containing 250 Africans was taken by a Brazilian cruiser, but forty-seven of the Africans were stolen. This fact caused a great outcry, and all the missing slaves, with the exception of about sixteen, were ultimately captured. Since the year 1856, I am prepared to prove on undoubted authority, that no slave has been run on the coast of Brazil, and that the slave trade there is entirely extinct. I will give a short quotation upon this point, for I do not like to make a statement of this nature without fortifying it by high authority, and what authority can be higher upon the subject than the opinion of the noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown? On the 5th of June, 1856, the noble Lord said—

"The slave trade might be regarded as extinct in Brazil, for though attempts had been made to revive it, they had not been attended with much success. There was generally evinced throughout the Brazil a spirit of determined hostility to the revival of the traffic."

Since that period the Brazilian Government have passed law after law; and, what is more, have attempted to enforce them in the strictest manner possible. It is a curious fact that not a single slave was employed in the construction of the 200 miles of railway made by English companies in Brazil. Moreover, I must say to his honour, the Prince de Joinville, who married a Portuguese Princess, is most decidedly opposed to the trade, and by his exertions and the spirit of the Portuguese Government, free labour has almost superseded slave labour. The whole of his estates are colonized by Germans, and, I believe, by a great many Swedes. The slave trade in Brazil has thus of late years received a blow from which, I think, it can never recover. What has been the conduct of this House in reference to this traffic? It was not too much to expect that the House would, with the extinction of the slave traffic, repeal the obnoxious Act of 1845—an Act which the Brazilians regarded as unjust and insulting; but the House did nothing of the kind. The House has been content to wait year after year, and to leave our enormous trade without protection. We have witnessed several abortive attempts on the part of several Governments to enter into treaties with Brazil, and both Lord Clarendon and Earl Russell have made ineffectual attempts in that direction. The Brazilians absolutely refused to enter into any treaty with us unless the Act of 1845 were repealed. And yet that Act still remains upon the statute-book, irritating public opinion in Brazil, doing incalculable mischief to our trade, and making our policy a byword among nations. Now I will call the attention of the House to the occurrences of last year, which I think ought to be taken into consideration. We all remember the case of the Forté, and the severe reprisals which were made upon the Brazilians by a British squadron. That case was referred to the general arbitrator in the disputes of nations, the King of the Belgians, who in June, 1863, gave his decision to the effect that the British officers were altogether in the wrong.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Not altogether.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Do you contradict it?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Yes.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Well, really, the noble Lord has the face to contradict anything. I did not expect that the statement would be contradicted, for, if I have read that award aright, the King of the Belgians said that the British officers were wrong, and that some amends ought to be made to the Brazilian Government. I can only wish that I had provided myself with the despatch, for the denial of the noble Lord shows how careful one ought to be. At any rate the decision was not in our favour. That, at least, the noble Lord will not gainsay, although he may, possibly, be able to get off upon a quibble of words. Well, there was another case. I find that in 1859 the British cruisers captured and retained a steamer belonging to the Republic of Paraguay, which was taken in the River La Plata. The whole affair was carefully kept secret until I asked whether any apology had been made. It was denied that any apology had been made; but the fact is that in 1862 Mr. Dorian, the British Chargé d'Affaires in that part of the world, was empowered to apologize to the Republic of Paraguay for the affront which had been offered to their steamer. I believe this to have been the first apology ever made by the noble Lord, and as such it is very curious, and deserves to be recorded in letters of gold. I have not the despatch by me, but I do not think that this will be denied. An apology was offered to the Government of Paraguay; but up to the present time no concession has been made in respect to the case of the Forto to the Brazilian Government. Do you dispute that? The Under Secretary has been rather unfortunate in his contradictions to me. He contradicted me in a previous debate, and he has not vacated his office yet. We have had incidental debates on this subject before, and after the question has been referred to Portuguese mediation I cannot understand why irritating and offensive language should be used by Her Majesty's Government.

VOL. CLXXVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

What must be the feeling of the noble Lord at the Foreign Office when he became aware of the use of such language. On the 8th of February, 1861, the noble Lord the Foreign Minister wrote to Mr. Christie—

"I think it right to observe for your information and guidance that, as the Government of Brazil have of late acted in perfect good faith in regard to the suppression of the slave trade, it would be advisable in any communications which you may have on this question of the emancipated negroes, to avoid as much as possible any discussions which may tend to continue the feeling of irritation which has so long existed in the public mind in Brazil against this country in reference to the slave trade."

That being the despatch of 1861, how can the irritating and improper language used in 1864 be reconciled with those expressions, and I should like to know whether the Portuguese Government would continue their mediation in the face of such language? Perhaps I may be contradicted in that, but I have information in my pocket which defies contradiction—and it may be that I am in a position to give some information to the Foreign Office, which is at once ignorant and insolent. What has been the policy of the Brazilian Government with regard to the emancipados? By a decree of 1858, the Brazilian Government altogether forbade any emancipated negroes to be appropriated to private individuals. None of these negroes could be apprenticed, except under the Government. The adoption of that step was most material. It has been denied that any of those men were really emancipated; but I have the Report of the Minister of Justice to the Brazilian Chambers, and from that it appears that in 1860-1 200 emancipados were made free; 147 in 1862-3; and 71 down to May, 1864. Yet in the teeth of all this it is denied by the First Minister of the Crown that any satisfaction had been given on these points, or that the Brazilian Government has taken any steps to emancipate these men. I now come to the most extraordinary statement that I have ever heard from the Treasury Bench—and I have heard a great many. It was said, in answer to a question—it looked very much like an arranged thing, and like what is called in the sporting world a "plant"—it was said that there were twenty requirements, without satisfying which no negro could obtain his freedom. I was puzzled to find where the document containing those requirements came from. It is well known that our agents and Consuls abroad all know the tenor of what the Foreign Office wishes, and Mr. Christie knows the spite of the noble Lord at the head of the Government against Brazil, and was willing to supply him with fuel in this way. On the 3rd of April, 1852, these twenty requirements were forwarded in a despatch from Mr. Christie. But where did he get them from? From any official document? By no means. They are contained in an Opposition newspaper, which is a sort of half Owl and half Punch, and the object of publishing them was to ridicule the law's delays in Brazil. However, Mr. Christie was only too happy to see them in the newspaper, cuts them out, and sends them to this country, and the noble Lord the Prime Minister seriously produces them in this House as official. What would the noble Lord say if he saw quoted in the Brazilian Chambers Punch's Essence of Parliament as authentic?—and yet that would be just an analogous proceeding. It is too bad that a nobleman holding the position of First Minister of the Crown, should come down to this House and endeavour to persuade the representatives of the country that that list of twenty requirements was an official Brazilian document, when in fact it was no other than a squib. In sober sadness I ask what is the policy of the noble Lord in regard to Brazil? Is it a hostile policy? Does he wish to worry these unfortunate Brazilians until, like Denmark, they should resist? I really do believe that the best thing they could do would be to show some spirit and resist the Act of 1845, and that would be sufficient to upset the present Ministry and would lead to the repeal of that piece of legislative oppression. It would not be difficult to prove that there has always been an understanding in Brazil that the Act would be repealed. The noble Lord the Prime Minister said the other night that Lord Aberdeen did not repeal the Act in 1852, when he was in office. Why, the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) was in Lord Aberdeen's Cabinet, and I always understood that he was an awkward colleague to Lord Aberdeen. We all know that, when the noble Lord takes up a thing, he does not lightly leave it off. I have no doubt that Lord Aberdeen would have repealed that Act but for the presence in his Cabinet of the noble Lord. Lord Aberdeen, in the debate on the 17th of June, 1858, said that the Act was so obnoxious to Brazil that it was called there "the Algerine Act;" that, on its introduction, he had stated that nothing would give him greater pleasure than the arrival of the day when it should be repealed, and he was not sure that the proper time for its repeal had not already arrived: it was, however, for Her Majesty's Government to decide; but the conduct of Brazil in this matter had been such as to entitle that country to much consideration at our hands; and he could only recommend the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the realization of what he promised when he originally introduced the Act. That was Lord Aberdeen's opinion so late as 1858; and although the First Minister of the Crown in 1864 had testified to the extinction of the slave trade to a great extent, and although it had been condemned by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne, yet the obnoxious Act remained upon our statute-book. Surely, using the language of menace and irritation is not the way in which a country like Brazil, no longer in its infancy, should be treated. If we want to get on with any country, we should employ terms of conciliation and not irritation. From the repeal of the Act of 1845 what state of things would result? Brazil would be too happy to enter into a commercial treaty and a postal convention with you on the condition, however, that you remove a stigma from them by repealing the Act of 1845. There could not be a better time than the present for the repeal, because in February of the present year there was a meeting of a new Parliament in Brazil, and I believe it is well known that the temper of that Assembly is such that if you repealed the Act of 1845 they would be ready to grant you anything in the way of commercial freedom. But so long as that Act remains in the statute-book, and so long as language is used in defence of that Act, so long will you have a state of irritation in Brazil, most unfortunate for that nation and most injurious to the commerce of this country.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, while the hon. Gentleman recommends mildness of language—of which he is so great a master—he has not himself used the mildest language in discussing this subject; but it is my intention rather to follow his precepts than to imitate his example. The hon. Gentleman says I am a great hand at denying. I think I may retort upon him that he is a great hand at asserting. I know—every body knows—the source whence the hon. Gentleman draws his information. [Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE: Where from?] From an active Brazilian agent. [Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE: I deny it.] The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well whom I mean. [Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE: No. What is his name?] He is indebted to an active Brazilian agent—an Englishman, I am sorry to say—who is very ready to supply information—what I think is sometimes incorrect information—to newspapers and others who are willing to undertake the cause of Brazil. I do not blame him, for he is doing his duty and is paid for it; but I only wish that those who adopt his statements in Parliament would take the trouble to be quite sure that what they assert is exactly correct. There was much in the speech of the hon. Gentleman which might provoke me to go into an angry discussion. [Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE: Be provoked then.] Never mind. Her Majesty's Government are now engaged through the Portuguese Government in negotiations, the object of which is to re-establish diplomatic relations between this country and Brazil. I do not think, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman has shown great judgment in endeavouring just at this moment to raise a controversial discussion on the matters to which his speech related. If I were to go into details in reference to his statements, the necessary consequence would be that I should be led to say things which he would again condemn; and thus the controversy would go on. I trust the House will allow that I am better performing my duty in abstaining from entering upon the details which the hon. Gentleman has gone into. As the hon. Gentleman has endeavoured to impress the House with an idea of the disadvantages occasioned to commerce, not only by our present relations with Brazil, but by those which have existed for some time, I will simply state the amount of our exports to and imports from Brazil in a certain period of time. From 1850 to 1852 the imports varied from £2,000,000 to some £2,100,000, and the exports from £2,000,000 to £3,000,000. From 1860 to the present time our imports from Brazil have been as follows:—In 1860, £2,200,000; 1861, £2,600,000; 1862, £4,400,000; 1863, £4,500,000. I say that that is not a state of things which shows that our commerce is under any disadvantages. Our exports to Brazil have grown not quite in the same degree.

From 1850 to 1852 they amounted to from £2,000,000 to £3,500,000; in 1860 they were £4,500,000; in 1861 they were rather more than £4,500,000; and in 1862-3 they were from £3,700,000 to £3,900,000. Therefore, as far as our commercial intercourse with Brazil is concerned, it cannot be established that it has suffered in consequence of the matters which have, no doubt, occasioned a considerable amount of irritation on the side of the Brazilians. It is quite true that the Brazilian slave trade has ceased since 1852. In the beginning of that year the Brazilian Government passed laws and established regulations which have, I believe, prevented any material importation of slaves into Brazil. But when the hon. Gentleman says there is such a dislike to the slave trade in Brazil, I must remind him that out of a population of 7,500,000 there are 3,000,000 slaves or only 1,000,000 short of the number in the Southern States of America. There are 10,000 emancipados. [Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE: There are more.] Then that tells still more against the hon. Gentleman, and at the rate at which, according to the hon. Gentleman, they are set free, they may be all dead before they are liberated. I must not, however, waste time by going into a controversial discussion with the hon. Gentleman on these subjects. I am anxious that the negotiations now going on should be successful; and I think the House would act wisely if it refrained from debate on this question, and did not allow things to be said on one side or the other which might revive angry feelings, and embarrass the negotiations which the Portuguese Government, with the best motives and in the best spirit, have undertaken to carry on.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: Sir, I do not desire to address the House at any length; but the speech of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) which we have just heard is so different in spirit to the one he delivered on a former occasion, that it is necessary I should make a few observations. The noble Lord has appeared in quite a new character, particularly with regard to Brazil. He says that he thinks the House will be of opinion that he will best discharge his duty by avoiding irritating language towards the Brazilian Government. ["Hear, hear!"] And I think that cheer shows the noble Lord that it is the opinion of the House that he will best discharge his duty by using moderate and courteous language towards that country. I can only express my regret—a regret which I know is shared by many Members—that what the noble Lord feels to be his duty now he did not feel to be his duty on former occasions. What was the language which, within a very short period, the noble Lord used in this House with reference to the Brazilian question? The noble Lord told the House that the conduct of the Brazilian Government was flagrant, disgraceful, and flagitious; and the noble Lord went on to say that, instead of giving merit to the Brazilian Government for any efforts on their part to put down the slave trade, it was only under the fear of the Aberdeen Act that the slave trade was not carried on now. The noble Lord refused on that occasion to give the slightest credit to the Brazilian Government, for what all the world acknowledges to have been most noble and praiseworthy conduct in their efforts to suppress the slave trade. The noble Lord may laugh, but that is an opinion which has been expressed by some of those who are as anxious to put down the slave trade, and who are as good friends of the negro as the noble Lord himself. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne) has quoted the opinion of Lord Truro; I quoted the other day the opinion of Lord Aberdeen; and I ask the noble Lord if he has not read that Lord Brougham said the other night, in another place, that the Brazilian Government were worthy of all praise, and had met with the success they deserved. And yet the noble Lord thinks he is performing his duty and is using moderate language when he uses the terms, flagrant, flagitious, and disgraceful towards the Brazilian Government. [Viscount PALMERSTON: I did not use the word flagitious.] The noble Lord did not confine his courtesies of language only to the Brazilian Government, because he told me that it argued great ignorance on my part that I did not know the contents of the document to which he referred. The hon. Member for Liskeard has already referred to that document; and what is it? It now appears that it was a squib from an opposition newspaper, which was cut out by our Chargé d’Affaires, and sent home to the noble Lord. It has never been laid on the table of the House, but it has appeared in a blue-book which is never distributed to Members. And this unauthentic document is that upon which the noble Lord, in the exercise of his courteous language towards Members on this side of the House, says is a mark of the grossest ignorance on my part that I did not know it. I have a number of statements, not derived, as the noble Lord says, from Brazilian sources, but from our own blue-books, which show that the Brazilian Government have the greatest difficulties to contend with in dealing with the emancipados. The country is extensive and the plantations are separated by vast distances, and the emancipados having been located in old times upon the plantations, there is great difficulty in getting an account of them. It is evident, however, that the Brazilian Government are making every effort in their power to get the negroes set free. In 1861 Mr. Christie mentioned that in one district letters of emancipation were being granted to the blacks in large numbers, and added, “This I know to be true;” also, that in the very last year the Brazilian Government had been exerting themselves in the most praiseworthy manner in reference to the emancipados, and had set free a great many employed in the Government establishments. And I defy Her Majesty’s Government to show that the Brazilian Government has not exhibited a most anxious desire to use every effort to carry into effect the stipulation with reference to their freeing the emancipados. I will not detain the House longer, but I could not help congratulating the noble Lord on the new course which he has adopted, and I hope he will continue to think that he will best discharge his duty by using moderate language to other countries, and that it will not be inconsistent with his duty not to use offensive language towards those who sit opposite to him.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he did not reproach the hon. Gentleman with not knowing the contents of the document referred to and laid on the table of the House last year. What he meant was, that the hon. Gentleman having been in the Foreign Office must have known the general conduct of the Brazilian Government in respect to the emancipados, and that frequent applications had been made to them for lists, which we have not been able to obtain.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he did not know it. It never came before him in the shape the noble Lord had put it.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he could not allow the discussion to close without expressing his regret at another point in the speech of the noble Lord. The noble Lord said the statistics he had read showed that the commerce of the country had suffered but little, if at all, from the interruption of diplomatic relations with Brazil. He was sorry to find that the Government entertained that opinion, for he feared it would lead them to take very little trouble to get diplomatic relations renewed. From communications with persons engaged in commerce between England and Brazil, he knew that traders laboured under constant and serious apprehension with regard to the risks to which their property—amounting to three or four millions sterling—was exposed in Brazil from the want of that protection which British commercial interests enjoyed in every other country, and that they stated in the most decided manner their conviction that the renewal of diplomatic relations would be followed by a considerable expansion of commerce. He trusted, therefore, that the Foreign Office would endeavour to ascertain whether or not this was a delusion under which the Government laboured. He pronounced it an utter and complete delusion. He was quite aware that the noble Lord could point to the Returns, showing the increase of imports and exports; but could the noble Lord contradict what he had stated—that the merchants were filled with apprehension in regard to their property, and that they said the exports could be, perhaps, doubled if commerce received due protection? He would give the noble Lord another instance which was worthy of his attention. In this country our merchants had at this moment claims against the Brazilian Government to the extent of several hundred thousand pounds. No person ever disputed the justice of those claims, and an attempt had been made to adjust them by means of a mixed Commission. Her Majesty's Government had repeatedly said that there ought to be means provided for repaying to the subjects of this country the claims to which they were justly entitled; yet, from the bad terms on which they were with the Brazilian Government, they had utterly failed in obtaining a satisfactory adjustment. He could tell Her Majesty's Government also, from his own personal communications with merchants in this country who were interested in the question, that they had long since ceased to importune the Foreign Office with regard to the resumption of diplomatic relations, simply because they were convinced of the inveterate and determined hostility felt by the noble Lord and the Foreign Office to the Government of Brazil. And he must say that when they heard such language as was heard in that House not many days ago from the noble Lord, that impression on the part of the merchants of this country must necessarily be confirmed. Reference had been made by the hon. Gentleman who introduced the discussion (Mr. B. Osborne) to the Aberdeen Act as being the primary and chief cause of the bitter feeling existing between this country and Brazil. In his (Sir Hugh Cairns) opinion, the causes of the rupture of diplomatic relations were these two—the Aberdeen Act and the language of the noble Lord. The noble Lord had not ventured that evening to say a word on the subject of the Aberdeen Act. As a question of international law, it was impossible to look at that Act without feelings of unmitigated amazement. He firmly believed that there was not a country in the world of whose strength we had any reason to be afraid against whom we should ever have ventured to direct such a measure. How was it that that Act happened to pass? It was because Sir Robert Peel brought it in under the sanction of his Government, and because the noble Lord who was then in Opposition supported it, and thus neutralized the opposition which would otherwise have been raised to it. But what did Sir Robert Peel say with reference to it? Did any one wish to know the history and merits of the Act? Let them read the short debate which took place upon the subject of that Act in 1845, and they would find that Sir Robert Peel said he felt that it was a most extreme and even extraordinary measure. He stopped the progress of it for some days in order that he might consider whether the objections made by Sir Thomas Wilde could be answered. He then said—

“It seems a very strong measure indeed for us to legislate for Brazilian subjects; and although we have the Treaty of 1826, which stipulates that the slave trade shall be deemed to be piracy on the part of Brazil, we will not venture, in our legislation, to deal with the persons and lives of Brazilian subjects, but will only deal with their property.” [3 Hansard, lxxxii. 1071.]

He (Sir Hugh Cairns) would like to know what right had we to deal with their property any more than with their lives? If the argument was worth a rush, the stipulation in the treaty that the trade should be piracy, if it gave this country the power of dealing with it by its municipal laws as piracy, gave it the power of dealing with the lives of those engaged in it just as much as with their property. The vice of the Act was at once shown, and condemnation branded upon it by these expressions. Let any one read the speech of the Attorney General of that day, who attempted to defend the measure, and say whether there was one word in his speech which answered the objections of Sir Thomas Wilde. In fact, the treaty was a stipulation between two countries that it should not be lawful for the subjects of the Emperor of Brazil to be concerned in carrying on the slave trade; but what did that mean? Did it mean that a foreign country was to pass laws to punish the subjects of another country as they thought fit? All that the Government of Brazil said was that they would have municipal laws passed in their own Legislature to punish their own subjects within their own jurisdiction. [Viscount PALMERSTON: Read what follows.] The words that followed did not alter the case in the least. All that was said was that it should not be lawful for the subjects of the Emperor of Brazil to be concerned in carrying on the slave trade under any pretence, and that carrying it on by any person who was a subject of His Imperial Majesty should be deemed and treated as piracy. But by whom was it to be so deemed and treated? Not by our Parliament so as to enable us to fix penalties; but it was to be so deemed and treated by the Brazilian Government, who if they had not power to punish it as piracy, could go to the Legislature and obtain that power. He again repeated that there was not a nation which would not have said, and said most truly, that this was a flagrant attempt to infringe the independence of its Legislature and its Sovereignty, and it would have been resented on that account.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he rose to do an act of justice to Mr. Christie, our Minister at Brazil, who had been spoken of in terms of reprobation by the hon. Member for Liskeard.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: I beg pardon. I said he was universally unpopular in Brazil.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Member had stated that Mr. Christie had somehow or other been provided for in this country. Now, whatever Mr. Christie derived from this country he had earned by honest service. But this was not the only act of injustice of which the hon. Member had been guilty. The hon. Member attributed to Mr. Christie having sent home an extract from a Brazilian paper, which had been quoted by the noble Lord at the head of the Government. Mr. Christie did no such thing. He held in his hand papers, which were accessible to every Member of that House, which showed that the extract in question was sent home by Mr. Elliot, the present Chargé d'Affaires, subsequent to Mr. Christie's recall. He had not the least wish to impugn the accuracy of the document, or to except to the hon. Member's description of the source whence it was derived, but he was anxious to exonerate Mr. Christie from the blame that had been heaped upon him for having in his diplomatic character sent home that document. He thought the substance of this debate must lead the House at once to understand that Mr. Christie was not likely to meet with justice at the hands of the Brazilian Government. He was sorry to say it appeared that the Government of Brazil were seeking to compel that House to repeal an Act of Parliament by persecuting Englishmen in Brazil. Such was the corruption among the Brazilian Judges that seven of them had been displaced since the difference between England and Brazil had been referred to arbitration, first to the King of the Belgians and now to the King of Portugal. He held in his hand a letter from a high official of the name of Don Jose do Narcimento Silva with reference to the case of a Mr. Reeves, which was under adjudication in Brazil. Mr. Reeves was a claimant—a joint claimant—for a sum of £20,000. With the permission of the House he would read the letter of the eminent person in Brazil to whom he had referred to the Judge who was to try the case. The writer said—

“Most Illustrious and Excellent Judge,—Your Excellency is a Judge in the cause in which an Englishman (Reeves) denies the maternity of a lady Deslinda, in order to deprive her of her inheritance from her son, and I am so convinced of the right of this lady that I take the liberty of asking you to vote for her. Read the arguments of Nabuco, compare them with the proofs in the cause, and you will see that what I ask is just. I thank you by anticipation for your kindness, and beg you to give orders to your most affectionate friend, &c.”

He could multiply proofs of attempts to corrupt the Judges engaged in trying cases between Brazilians and Englishmen. He hoped that the result of this discussion would be to show to the House that if harsh measures appeared to have been used towards Brazil it must be borne in mind that Brazil had been persecuting English subjects, and had refused to answer the notes of the English Government, and had maligned Mr. Christie by agents here as well as in Brazil. They must remember the animus manifested by Brazil, and that Brazil was trying by these means to coerce the English Legislature into a repeal of the Act, which was certainly justifiable at the time it was passed. Indeed, if the accounts which we received of the state of the internal slave trade of Brazil were true, the Act was not only justifiable but was actually necessary. He believed that that Act was necessary still, for the price of slaves in Brazil was rising, and he suspected that one of the inducements which made the Brazilians so anxious to obtain the repeal of the Act of 1845 was that they might "abate," as they called it, the price of slaves. Within Brazil at this moment the internal slave trade was of a most (he would not use harsh terms) painful character. Slaves were torn from one province to be sent to another; husbands were separated from their wives, the mother from the child, and children sold from ten to twelve years old. This was the state of things under which we were asked to abandon the policy we had hitherto pursued. If ever there was a justification for our interference in any case against the renewal of the slave trade, he believed it was in the case of Brazil; and when the hon. Member for Liskeard appealed to the fact that the English railway companies who were constructing railways in Brazil had never employed a single slave on their works, he (Mr. Newdegate) thanked God that his fellow-countrymen had discarded that infernal traffic in the undertakings in which they were engaged. He thought, however, that the very fact of the hon. Member mentioning that circumstance showed how general was the employment of slave labour in Brazil.

Mr. T. BARING thought his hon. Friend who had just spoken (Mr. Newdegate) had rather wandered from the question, which was not whether Mr. Christie had been abused, or whether Brazilian Judges were corrupt, but whether by conciliation and kind language we were not likely to renew friendly relations with Brazil, to increase our commerce, to obtain justice for Englishmen, and to succeed in the negotiations which were now taking place? His hon. Friend might say that the internal slave trade was an abominable traffic, and so it was; but the Act of 1845 was not levelled against the internal, but against the foreign slave trade; and when there was evidence that in Brazil the latter had ceased, the whole case of his hon.

Friend fell to the ground. The question then was, whether we were to persevere in a course of action which had drawn a line of separation between this country and Brazil; or whether we should now enter upon a policy of conciliation, instead of that taunting, irritating policy which we had hitherto pursued?

ST. BERNARD'S REFORMATORY, LEICESTERSHIRE. — OBSERVATIONS.

MR. PACKE said, he rose to call attention to the Report of the Inspector of Reformatories, on the state of the St. Bernard's Reformatory at Whitwick, in Leicestershire. In doing so he begged to assure his noble Friend the Member for Arundel (Lord E. Howard) and the other Roman Catholic Members of the House, that he was actuated by no invidious motives. Last year an outbreak had taken place in this Reformatory of so serious a nature that some of the police who were called in were nearly murdered by the boys who were engaged in the disturbance. The Reformatory was then under the management of the monks of St. Bernard; but as it was found they were not able to deal with such refractory youths, it was afterwards transferred to other hands. On the 19th of June, 1863, it was agreed to commit the management to a number of gentlemen, whose names were among the most respectable of the Roman Catholics of this country, and among them were two clergymen. On the 19th of June Mr. Harper, one of the committee of management, wrote a letter stating that the government of the institution was completely altered, and that rules had been formed by means of which the boys would be kept in the most perfect order. One of the rules was to the effect that no boy should be suffered to go out of the school without being under the supervision of one of the authorities. That rule the managers had no means of enforcing. Mr. Sydney Turner, the Inspector of Reformatories, wrote to the Secretary of State, informing him that the arrangements were complete; that the new system ought be allowed to go on for one year from the 1st of July; that during that interval the number of inmates would be limited to 100, and that the experience of twelve months would enable them to see whether the Reformatory could be successfully conducted. Within four months from that time the Inspector visited the institution again, and expressed himself perfectly satisfied with what he had seen, although he said there were 143 boys within the walls. It appeared, then, that as regarded the number of boys the arrangement which had been entered into with the Secretary of State four months before had been altered. At the end of the last year the chairman of the bench of magistrates in the neighbourhood of the Reformatory wrote to the Secretary of State, informing him that for several nights the police had been obliged to be in the institution; that between thirty and forty of the inmates, who had got loose, had been put into gaol for various offences; and that four of them had been committed to take their trial for burglary. The facts of the case were these—the boys had got up at night, tied the sheets of their beds together, let themselves down from the windows, a height of about nineteen feet, and so having escaped committed this burglary. Here was a body of nearly 150 of the worst young scamps to be found in the country, youths brought up to crime, who having the means of escape within their reach might commit any depredation they liked in the neighbourhood. When he was a boy at Eton the windows of the boarding house in which he lodged were barred, so that there were no means of getting out at night. Well, he should like to know whether boys who were notorious for vice were to be trusted in rooms where there were no bars to the windows. Things soon after arrived at such a pass that the police were several nights obliged to remain in the Reformatory to help to take care of those boys. His right hon. Friend the Home Secretary sent down Mr. Sydney Turner to investigate the facts. In his Report Mr. Turner stated that an effective staff of officers ought to be engaged. What he (Mr. Packe) had apprehended had taken place, and the authorities had shown that they could not manage the maximum of 150 boys. Mr. Sydney Turner was in error when he said that the number would be limited to 100. But this gentleman concluded his Report by stating that he believed there was no reason to fear their being taken by surprise in the future. Why they should have been taken by surprise between 1863 and 1864 he could not understand, as the authorities well knew the ferocious temper of the boys. When the new management was instituted an efficient staff of officers was to form part of the establishment; but the sequel showed how far the staff had been able to keep the boys in any kind of order. As an acting magistrate of the county of Leicester the point on which he wished to dwell had reference to the employment of the county police in aid of the management of this Reformatory. In Leicestershire they had no more police constables than were necessary to keep the peace of the county, and they could not, therefore, spare any part of the force to assist the authorities of that institution in maintaining order there. How was it that this Reformatory could not be managed without such extraneous assistance? The chief constable, in his letter of the 5th of June, said he trusted that arrangements had been made with Inspector Ward and constables for speedily calling in other assistance in case of need. But the police ought not to be made to stand sentry to a Reformatory. From a letter addressed to a local paper the other day, he found that Mr. Quick, the manager of that Reformatory, said he had sent for twenty of the London police, but he was referred to the police of the county, on whom he had to fall back. Mr. Quick was, he believed, a very respectable man, and a clergyman, who wished to manage these unruly lads by mildness and kindness; but he was deficient in firmness, and was really no more capable of managing such an institution than he was of being Governor of Newgate. These boys were principally Irish, from Liverpool and its neighbourhood. As matters at present stood, the conductors of that Reformatory did not find efficient men to restrain these felonious boys from committing depredations over the county; and he desired to impress upon the Secretary of State that the county of Leicester ought not to be called upon to furnish police to control this ill managed institution.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was not surprised that the hon. Gentleman, as a Member for the county of Leicester, should have called the attention of the House to the disturbances which had recently taken place in the St. Bernard's Reformatory. The facts of the case were all contained in the papers which had been laid on the table, and from them it appeared, that although the Reformatory some time ago was certainly not managed in a way which could be regarded as in any degree satisfactory, yet its management had been greatly improved during the past year. The gentlemen in whose hands the management of the institution had been placed last year had exerted themselves to the utmost in reforming it and placing it on a better footing. At the same time, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman that sufficient energy had not been shown by the rev. Mr. Quick, who was, no doubt, anxious to do his duty, but who was not a fit person to have the control of lads of such a class. But since the late outbreak, which certainly did take the officers by surprise, he was given to understand that the managers had determined to increase their staff materially, by which means the attendance of the police would be dispensed with. It was not reasonable that any large number of the county police should be obliged to abandon their ordinary duty elsewhere, and to go to the neighbourhood of that Reformatory. He was informed that there would be associated with Mr. Quick a lay manager, who had been accustomed to the discipline of the army, and who would be better able to control these lads than a clergyman. It should be mentioned also that this was not the only case of outbreak in a Reformatory. There had been outbreaks of a similar description in other Reformatories, which were under Protestant management; but he hoped that the precautions now taken would prevent any recurrence of these disturbances. [Mr. PACE: The windows should be barred.] If such disorderly proceedings were continued, it would be absolutely essential for the peace of the neighbourhood to withdraw the certificate from the institution; but it would be difficult to avoid doing more harm than good by its immediate withdrawal, because the lads would no longer be in legal custody, and would, perhaps, be guilty of acts more mischievous and calculated to excite greater alarm than if they were detained in the Reformatory. A ship had been assigned by the Admiralty to be placed in the Mersey for the reception of boys of that class; and although the lads now at St. Bernard's Reformatory might not be transferred to that ship, yet, by using that vessel as a means of exercising an efficient discipline over all the boys who might hereafter be committed to a Roman Catholic Reformatory from that part of the country, the necessity of sending any more of them to the St. Bernard's Reformatory would be obviated. At all events, unless every ground of complaint was effectually removed, the permission to send boys to this Reformatory would not be continued. But, although the alarm which had been excited in this case was in a considerable degree well grounded, he hoped the House would not discourage the efforts now being made—which were certainly well meant—for the improvement and good management of this Reformatory.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the House could not be surprised that very considerable interest had been excited in the neighbourhood of this Reformatory by the proceedings which had taken place, and he believed he might say that the feeling was unanimous that the Reformatory ought to be removed. The boys placed there had been brought from a great distance, and it was quite clear they had been placed under a management which was not capable of conducting an establishment of that description. The whole neighbourhood had been kept in constant apprehension, and even the monks themselves were quite as anxious as others to be freed from the neighbourhood of these refractory lads. The right hon. Baronet had detailed the steps which had been taken for improving the future management, and as representing that part of the county he must say he should be very glad if those measures did succeed; but if another outbreak should occur he hoped the certificate would not be extended; that the boys would be sent to the ship at Liverpool; that measures would be taken to free Leicestershire from the evils to which the county had in no way contributed, and that they would hear no more of these most serious and unpleasant outbreaks.

MR. HEYGATE said, the alarm which prevailed on this subject had been somewhat exaggerated in the newspapers and elsewhere; still, as he lived in the immediate neighbourhood, he must say he could not look with indifference at repeated outbreaks of this character. The right hon. Baronet, however, had exercised a wise discretion in not withdrawing his certificate, as a very great improvement had taken place in the management. These outbreaks were to a large extent attributable to the number of boys crowded together being greater than could well be managed in one reformatory; and a Report to that effect had been made two years ago by the Inspector. The reconvictions almost always came from reformatories where the largest number of boys were collected together. With reference to the increased expenditure which these outbreaks had occasioned to the county, it was quite true that two or three policemen had for some time after patrolled the neighbourhood; but the expense, even if it had not been repaid, which it was subsequently, had been insignificant. He hoped the change which had been made in the government of the Reformatory would lead to a better state of things, and that the right hon. Baronet would recommend a smaller number of boys to be kept there in future.

MR. NEWDEGATE expressed his hope that no establishments of this kind would be set on foot for the future.

PASSPORTS IN FRANCE—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether passports are required by British subjects travelling in France? The subject would, no doubt, be interesting to the large body of persons who were about to travel on the Continent. Looking to the tone of the articles which appeared in the German papers, he did not think Englishmen going to Switzerland would be likely to go through Prussia—they would, no doubt, much prefer going through France. Some time ago a notice appeared in the Moniteur, which stated that the subjects of Her Majesty would not be required to produce passports when travelling in France. This very liberal notice not only showed the kind feeling of the Emperor of the French, but it was also a most politic statement, for it induced large numbers of Englishmen to take the route through France to the Continent; but, notwithstanding the notice to which he referred, cases had occurred of British subjects being seriously molested in consequence of not having passports. He could mention several such instances. One English gentleman while travelling in the South of France, on arriving at the chief town of a department, was asked by the gendarmes for his passport. He replied he was a British subject and he understood a passport was not required. The demand was repeated: he made the same answer, and calling his servant pointed to his baggage, which bore his address in London. Notwithstanding this, he was forcibly removed and marched along a hot road in the South of France, in order to be brought before an official—he supposed the sous préfet of the department. This gentleman stated that there was no charge against him, he was dismissed, and he found his way back to the hotel. Complaint was made to the English Ambassador, who, he believed, communicated with the Government of the Emperor; but the gentleman in question had, he believed, received no apology or redress from any one. He did not bring forward this particular case as a grievance, but he had heard of many others, and that for one case that obtained publicity many were probably never heard of. The answer of the French Government might be—"True, a British subject needs no passport in France; but how are we to know that a traveller is a British subject?" He admitted the force of that dilemma. They had all read the description of Britons by the Irish poet—

I see the lords of human kind pass by."

But if foreigners might be pardoned if they did not recognize the travelling Briton by this description, for the haggard individual, generally accompanied by females, who was seen wandering about railway stations of a morning in a state of listlessness, hardly bore any of the poet's marks of a Briton about him. Still he did not think that he ought to be exposed to the risk of being detained for some hours for not having a passport when he had been told that no passport was necessary. He believed that if a communication were made by the Foreign Office to the French Government it would be a convenience to a large number of persons. The Government of the Emperor having notified that British subjects required no passport, the onus probandi was, he thought, thrown upon the French officials to show that a British subject was not what he professed to be, instead of the onus being upon him to show that he was a British subject. He trusted that some arrangement would be come to for doing away with this source of inconvenience to English travellers in France.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the subject should receive the attention of Her Majesty's Government.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

(1.) £860,276, Post Office Packet Service.

MR. CAVE, in rising to put the question of which he had given notice, in regard to the West India Contract, said, he wished to make a few remarks in explanation of his meaning. Early in the Session he had been surprised to receive at the West India Committee the copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Colonial Office, dated the 11th of March, calling upon the colonies to contribute towards the expenses of the Packet Service. That letter contained some remarkable passages; among other things credit was taken for the liberality of the proposal only to desire the colonies to contribute where they are directly concerned. They were not to be asked, for instance, to pay for the service from St. Thomas to Mexico. It would certainly be somewhat astonishing to call upon a British colony to pay any portion of the expense of the packet service from one foreign country to another. The geographical knowledge of Government Departments had been said to be limited, and a story had been told of a despatch addressed to "the Island of Demarara," but he (Mr. Cave) would not suppose that the Treasury could be ignorant that St. Thomas was not a British island, but was, perhaps, by that time almost the only possession left to the unhappy King of Denmark. The last passage, however, of the letter was most worthy of note. It ran thus—

"It will be necessary that the payments to be made by the several colonies should be made not later than the 30th of June next, and the corresponding payments not later than the same day in each succeeding year."

This looked so much like an attempt to tax the colonies without their consent, that he put a question to the Secretary to the Treasury, who informed the House that the meaning intended to be conveyed was that those colonies which wished to avail themselves of the packet service would be expected to contribute. He (Mr. Cave) then moved for the correspondence relating to these circumstances, which had lately been delivered to hon. Members. He there found that in 1862 there was a letter from the Treasury to the Colonial Office, stating the intention of Government to terminate the contract at the beginning of this year, indicating very vaguely, and, as it had turned out very incorrectly, the substance of the new contract, and suggesting that the West India Colonies should contribute in certain imperfectly explained proportions. The letter was communicated through the office to the West India Colonies. Owing to the vague and hypothetical nature of the communication but little attention was paid to it in the West Indies. Such replies, however, as were sent home were in the main decidedly unfavourable. Under such circumstances, he should have imagined that the Government would have gone more closely into the matter, fixed upon a maximum contribution for each colony, which might easily have been done, and then either left the conveyance of mails to open competition, or in case the replies received were sufficiently encouraging, entered upon the new contract only in respect of such colonies as came into their terms. But what did the Government do? They left the matter wholly in abeyance for two years, and sent no other message to the colonies, and entered into a fresh contract with the Royal Mail Company without giving the colonies any voice in the matter. They bound themselves for six years to pay nearly £173,000 a year, and passed the contract through the House in a hurry at the end of last Session, suspending the Standing Order which required contracts to be laid on the table for a month, or rather, inducing the House prematurely to approve of the contract, as it was impossible to comply with the order, and that with so little publicity that there was no trace of it in Hansard. He did not, however, complain either of the new contract or of the Royal Mail Company. He believed the terms were fair enough, as contracts went, if it was requisite to have a contract at all. And he quite concurred in the opinion expressed in the Postmaster General's last Report, that the company had done their part remarkably well. He (Mr. Cave) had every reason to speak well of them. The contract was approved by the House, and therefore was a matter of certainty at the end of last Session—namely, in July, 1863. Nothing was hinted about West India contributions, which might, of course, have been calculated by the same time; but on the 11th of March this year the peremptory demand to which he had alluded was made, which reached the West Indies about the beginning of May. This gave them two months to convene their Legislative Assemblies to pass the necessary Bills, after debate through both branches of their respective Legislatures, to raise and pay the money, amounting in the case of Jamaica alone, the most impoverished of the colonies, to no less than £11,634. Why, the demand of Austria and Prussia that the unhappy Danes should revoke their Patent of Constitution within an impossible time was not more unreasonable. No wonder if the replies were—as he had been informed they were—unfavourable; and yet credit was taken in these estimates for the whole amount of £37,554—a remarkable instance of reckoning chickens before they were hatched! Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman could give the House some information upon the point, as well as upon the course Her Majesty's Government intended to take. If the right hon. Gentleman replied that he would simply refuse to carry the mails, then—if he (Mr. Cave) might be pardoned for using a very ordinary expression—he would be cutting off his nose to spite his face, as he would lose the postage of the letters and yet be bound to pay the whole subsidy, nearly £173,000. He doubted whether the right hon. Gentleman would punish the colonies so much, after all, as he supposed. When the contract which had lately expired commenced, the West Indian waters were in the undisturbed possession of the Royal Mail Company. Now, no less than five competing steamship lines had appeared, or were in contemplation. There was, first, the heavily-subsidized French line of the Messageries Impériales, sailing once a month, calling at the English Islands of St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Grenada, and Trinidad, and passing within hail of Jamaica. There was, secondly, the Spanish mail line from Havannah and Porto Rico, passing close to Jamaica, and not far from the Leeward Islands. There was, thirdly, the West India and Pacific Company, sailing four times a month from Liverpool, and calling at Jamaica and Trinidad. These three lines of steamers were actually running, and their days of sailing were advertized. Fourthly, a line was projected between Jamaica and New York in correspondence with Cunard's steamers; and, fifthly, a line was contemplated from England to Madeira and Demerara. The Government, while they were thus deprived of the power of sealing up the recusant colonies—which, if it could be done, would probably inflict greater inconvenience on this than on the other side the Atlantic—had positively tempted them, under any circumstances, to avoid sending their correspondence by Her Majesty's mails, because they had lately doubled the postage on letters sent by the Royal Mail steamers, and very much reduced that on letters sent by private ships, which would, of course, apply to every line he had enumerated, except, perhaps, the French and Spanish. He could not imagine on what principle the Government had acted in dealing with this postage. Formerly the postage to foreign countries was three times the amount to the British colonies; for example, it was 6*d.* to Jamaica and 1*s.* 6*d.* to Cuba, on the ground, as he had always understood, that foreign countries which contributed nothing directly should thus pay indirectly some portion of the subsidy. He asked the right hon. Gentleman last year, when the change was made, whether any part of the subsidy was now to be paid by these foreign countries. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to wonder at the question, and said that such a thing was never heard of. He would now give him a precedent. A correspondence had lately taken place between the Colonial Office and Mauritius, in which that Island had been called upon to pay £6,000 a year more to the Peninsular and Oriental Company on account of the refusal of the French colony of Réunion to pay any longer its proportion of £12,000 a year, the French Government having determined to run a line of its own. And he might add that the West India Telegraph Company had applied for a subsidy from those foreign colonies through which it might pass, and that those applications had been favourably received. Either this packet service was, according to one opinion, such a benefit to this country, both in maintenance of communication and securing large and swift vessels in case of emergency, that it ought to be kept up by the Imperial Exchequer; or, according to another view, it was of equal advantage to the countries to which the mails were carried, in which case we should neither demand payment from British colonies alone, nor continue to bear the whole loss of running mails to foreign countries. It was only fair to admit that the case was one of difficulty. The colonies and their correspondents here would doubtless have complained had the contract been abruptly terminated, and there would have been difficulties in the way of bringing all the colonies to an agreement; but there were two years to spare from the time that the idea was first propounded by the Postmaster General, and those difficulties would have been far less than these in which the Government found themselves involved by the course they had preferred. He, therefore, begged to ask what prospect there was of recovering the proportion to be paid by the colonies, £37,554, and what measures would be taken by Her Majesty's Government in the case of the colonies declining to contribute their quota?

MR. PEEL thought that, upon whatever question of detail the hon. Gentleman might raise objections, he would not deny that the claims upon the West India Colonies were perfectly fair and legitimate. It was quite as much for the advantage of the West India Colonies as for the advantage of this country that regular postal communication should be maintained, and if they shared the benefit it was only reasonable that they should share the cost. The rule applied to those colonies was a rule generally adopted with respect to other colonies. In the case of India, one-half of the expense of the mail service was defrayed by the Indian Government; and in the case of Australia, one-half of the loss arising upon the postal service was paid by the different Australian Colonies. Canada and Mauritius maintained mail services at their own expense; and with respect to the Cape, which made no contribution, the proceeds of the postal charges were more than sufficient to meet the expenses. With respect to the mode in which the claims upon the colonies had been computed, he would observe that the mail line went direct to St. Thomas and there branched off in three directions, and no claim was made upon the West Indian Colonies for the expense of those portions of the service which extended beyond St. Thomas to Brazil or Mexico. The Correspondence upon the table showed that when the West India Mail Company was asked what reduction in their terms they could agree to if their service was confined to the West India Islands, and not extended to Mexico and other foreign ports, the answer was, that no reduction could be made, because it was precisely from those other portions of the service beyond the West Indian Colonies that they expected to derive a remuneration which would compensate for the loss upon other branches of the service. The hon. Gentleman had asked what answers had been received from the West Indian Colonies. He (Mr. Peel) had only seen three answers—of Jamaica, of Granada, and of British Guiana—all of which were unfavourable. What he had stated at the beginning of the Session was, that if the colonies were able to contribute but declined to do so, then the Government would consider what steps should be taken. But if it were proved that a colony was unable to pay the amount demanded, the Government would be disposed to treat it with every consideration. With respect to the difference between the treatment of our own colonies and those belonging to other countries, he would remind the hon. Gentleman that a very large proportion of the whole amount of sea-postage was derived from those foreign colonies—as much as £45,000 out of a total of £60,000 in 1860.

MR. CAVE did not think the cases of India and Australia were quite in point. India had not self-government, and the consent of the Australian Colonies had been obtained before the contract was concluded, a course which ought to have been followed in regard to the West Indies. He did not object to the principle of the colonies paying their fair proportions; he objected most to the manner in which the demands upon them had been made. He thought the Government should have asked their consent, and should have waited for their answers before making arrangements.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £1,600,000, Exchequer Bonds, agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he had upon former occasions called attention to this Vote, and he felt bound to do so again, because recent occurrences had made it still more necessary that the attention of the Committee should be given to it. He did not desire to go into any discussion of the Ashantee war or of the transactions connected with it, but he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the imperfect control of Parliament over this Vote, with a view, if possible, of inducing the Government to make a better arrangement in future. For his own part he thought it a mistake to endeavour to extend our forts and our possessions in that part of the world. By such a course they did not advance the great cause which was the justification for the great sacrifice of life upon that coast—the suppression of the slave trade—while, on the other hand, these settlements were of little or no advantage in a commercial point of view.

It appeared that at Lagos, of which place we took possession because of the once flourishing trade carried on there, since our occupation the trade had very much diminished. He was afraid that our occupation of Lagos had been in part the cause of some of the squabbles which we had got into in that part of the world. What he wanted to press upon the Committee was, that there ought to be some control over what was done on the African coast. At present Parliament knew hardly anything of what was going on until it was called upon to vote the money which had been spent. It was very difficult for the Secretary of State to control the Colonial Governors. They did what they thought proper, and when they told their story to the Colonial Secretary he had to choose between disavowing and recalling the Governor or of approving steps which, had he been consulted beforehand, he would probably never have sanctioned. There were in the colonies none of the checks which existed in this country; probably the resident Europeans were all for taking possession of their neighbours' property, desired to spread their power and influence, and looked at things in a light very different from that in which they were regarded in this country. Some check or control over the doings of these Governors was more than ever needed now, because there seemed to be among them a disposition to spread the territory of this country, seizing a bit here and a bit there in a manner which would produce difficulties that might ultimately take the form of war, like that with Ashantee. As an illustration of the sort of thing which went on upon this coast, he would mention what had occurred at Lagos. He did not intend to repeat any opinion upon the steps which had been taken—although he retained his original opinion, he would now say nothing about the occupation of Lagos itself; but what he complained of was that all these things were done without any check or control, and without Parliament knowing anything of what was being done. On the 14th of November, 1862, the Governor of Lagos issued a proclamation recalling from Abbeokuta all English residents in that place—a measure he should say of very doubtful legality, and one which was not brought to the knowledge of Parliament until the publication of the blue-book about a month ago. The difference which had caused the issuing of this proclamation led on the 2nd of March,

Sir Francis Baring

1863, to a blockade of Abbeokuta, which had this unfortunate result—that although the King of Dahomey, who seemed to be rather in favour at present, was marching towards that place, the Abbeokutans were prevented from obtaining guns and gunpowder with which to defend themselves against him. Last year there was another small war which was only brought to the knowledge of that House by a private Member; and in the month of February Governor Freeman took possession of a small piece of territory, as he declared, because it interfered with his financial arrangements. These measures might be right, or they might be wrong, but they ought not to have been taken without the knowledge and without being subject to some control on the part of the Home Government and the Parliament of this country. He was afraid that the Secretary of State would always have difficulty in dealing with Colonial Governors; but in his opinion the best mode of protecting the country against their mistakes was, that all these matters should as early as possible be brought to the knowledge of Parliament. There was nothing like a discussion in that House for making men act with caution. If these Governors knew that within a certain time after they had taken a step it would be discussed in that House, he would answer for it that there would be considerable hesitation and delay before they took the initiative in wars, or seized upon territory. What he should recommend was, that the Secretary of State should address to all the Governors stringent directions in the spirit of those contained in his despatch to Governor Pine, forbidding them, except in cases of necessity, to seize territory or to go to war without previous communication with him; and that beyond that, whenever such an event occurred, the Government should, if Parliament was sitting, immediately, and if it was not, then within a few days after its meeting, lay upon the table papers explaining what had been done. He felt satisfied that if some such course were pursued, matters would be much more carefully conducted, and that the Secretary of State would be assisted in keeping a check on those whom, under existing circumstances, he was unable to keep in order.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he observed a charge of £2,000 a year for a steamer for the use of the Governor of Gambia. He should like to know what duties were performed by that steamer? There was also £4,000 for the maintenance of forts and establishments on the Gold Coast. Was there any need of such an outlay in order to keep off the poor blacks? The Vote of £4,600 for Lagos included £3,125 for works and buildings. He should be glad to know what those works and buildings were?

SIR JOHN HAY said, he wished to draw the attention of the Committee to two items in the Vote—that of £500 for the relief of famine on the Gold Coast, and that of £2,000 for the Ashantee war. It was hardly just to the country, he thought, to lead it to suppose that the expenses of a war which would more probably cost £200,000 would be defrayed by the latter amount, or that the famine in question could be effectually relieved for the sum which the Committee was asked to vote for the purpose. Since, he might add, the question of the Ashantee war had been discussed in that House, some further papers with respect to it had been produced, and the Colonial Office had, he was bound to say, duly performed its part in that respect. He was, however, surprised to find that the military authorities had furnished no information as to the operations which had very recently taken place. But to return for a moment to the famine, he found at page 9 of the "Further Papers" to which he alluded, a despatch addressed to the Duke of Newcastle, and dated July 13, 1863, in which Governor Pine said—

"I highly approve and earnestly join in the prayer of the deputation, that your Grace will be pleased to provide this Government with supplies of provisions; for I firmly believe that the greatest distress will exist ere long, and that thereby, unless provided against, the movements which I so earnestly advocate, so soon as the rainy season shall be over, will be retarded."

Now, shortly after that letter was written, 500 additional troops were landed on the Gold Coast, and in the month of October, the Governor having evidently received from the Colonial Office a letter which was not to be found in the papers wrote as follows:—

"I regret to perceive that your Grace is not in a position to hold out any promise of aid from Imperial funds with respect to a provision against the famine which I now regret to state is ravaging the country, in proof of which I have to mention that the price of a bushel of Indian corn, the staple article of food, has risen from 2s. 6d. to 13s. 6d., and I have not the slightest prospect of being able to alleviate the distress from colonial funds."

While such was the state of things, 1,600 men had been sent out to add to the distress, who never drew a trigger, who died, or were dying off, under the influence of the climate; and it, therefore, appeared to him absurd to come to the House of Commons to ask for such a sum as £500 to alleviate the famine which prevailed. Mr. Blanc, the Commissary General, had, he believed, endeavoured to make provision for the troops to a certain extent, and by his labours the distress had, no doubt, been diminished; but there must have been a large outlay of public money, which we should eventually have to pay. To advert, however, more particularly to the operations of the war, he must say that the papers with respect to it, which had been preceded by such a note of triumph, were not of the value which hon. Members had been led to hope. When he came to examine them he found they contained only the plan of operations of May, 1860, in which many places in which operations had now taken place were not mentioned. [Mr. CARDWELL: They relate to Major Cochrane's operations.] Exactly so; to Major Cochrane's operations four years ago, and not to those under discussion. There was no plan of the operations in which the troops were engaged which could be of any advantage in the present discussion. There was nothing about the Prah or the expedition to Comassie. Now, in the West African Times, which should be an authority on the matter, he perceived that great jubilation was expressed at the expenditure which was going on throughout the course of this year—something like £14,000 a month for the last fourteen months. To ask for a sum of £2,000 under those circumstances did, he must confess, seem to him to be somewhat absurd. He could, he might add, to some extent confirm what fell just before from the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring), because he had information to the effect that in the course of last autumn an English officer arrived at Sierra Leone, having with him some sick men, for whom he wished to provide; but he found the military hospital quite full, most of the cases arising from gunshot wounds, the result, as he was told, of a battle which had taken place at Lagos. Now, how was it, if that were so, that we had never heard of that battle? It was desirable, he thought, that the House of Commons should be enlightened as to when and why, and by whose orders a war was being conducted in Lagos. But to return to Cape Coast Castle; he believed that matters were worse than they were when the House discussed the question. He held in his hand a letter from a medical officer, who was now the principal, and, indeed, the only medical man at the station, in which he said—

“I have now but bad news. There is no end of sickness here. I never had so much to do in my life; one of my assistants died in my room last Monday evening. His was a most melancholy case. He was sent out from the West Indies in charge of the troops which came to aid us, and which have only helped to crowd our house. He and Dr. Flynn, an old Trinity chum, were sent in charge, and with general orders to proceed at once back; but the great want of medical officers required that I should detain them. Dr. Flynn I sent on to Lima (after being two months here) with invalids. Dr. Greig, the other, I sent in charge of troops on the march to the Prah, with orders to return at once. On his return he took ill of fever and dysentery, not severe at first. I brought him out of his lodgings to stay with me in my own room, where I could often see him; but, notwithstanding all care, he died on the 31st of May. He was buried on the 1st of June, the first officer in the new burial ground. Since its use on the 1st of May a man has been buried every day nearly. I have now only one to help me, and he is constantly taken ill. I have been sometimes alone for the whole work. Since I have been here, of five officers four have died, three of the medical staff, and one engineer—nine altogether, and fourteen invalided home. An officer of the 2nd West arrived with the troops on the 9th of April. He brought his wife, an old traveller, well accustomed to the tropics. She was carried on board ship in a basket on the 14th of May, and died two days after at sea. Anything like the privation and abomination of this place it would be impossible to find. I forgot to mention that if the military staff had been invalided home every mail that leaves carries a freight of fever-stricken mortals, who are hoisted on board in a basket, and then have to bear a single sea voyage in the worst ocean-going steamers that leave England. Coal coasters at home are larger and better than this African line. I wish the English people knew the real cost in life and money of this attempt to put down slavery. I suppose that is the only reason for keeping up these settlements. I am convinced. What the war is for I don't believe is known in England, and what it is costing in the articles above mentioned, I don't think either is known; or else, if so, they must see some great value unappreciated out here in the natives or country. Well, this is all unpleasant, and so any news of this place is ever likely to be.”

That letter would prove that the statements which had been made upon the subject had not been exaggerated. No doubt the Government had had their attention directed to the letter from Commodore

Sir John Hay

Willmot, a man of consummate ability, and than whom no one was more competent to express an opinion upon matters relating to the West Coast of Africa. In that letter that officer spoke of the insane nature of our operations upon the coast, and urged upon the Government the impropriety of carrying out the scheme upon which they had determined. He was sorry that his noble Friend (Lord Clarence Paget) had hesitated to give him the information which he had asked for on a previous occasion, with reference to the speed of the squadron stationed on the West Coast of Africa; but as his noble Friend had hesitated to afford him that information, he had been compelled to obtain it from other sources. We maintained seventeen steamers on the coast, and of these he found that the Rattlesnake was the only vessel capable of going ten knots an hour, and that of the others the fastest could only go 8·3 knots an hour. This calculation of speed was made according to the measured mile, and, as they all knew, the measured mile was the greatest possible effort that could be made, for something always occurred to prevent such a rate of speed being attained when a ship came into actual service. The fact was that we had a squadron of about seventeen vessels on the coast, the speed generally being seven knots an hour, some of them not being even so fast. And this was the case when they knew that the very fastest American steamers were sold to the Spaniards for the purposes of the slave trade. He had in his pocket an account of a very fast vessel passing through four of our steamers, communicating with the shore, and going out again with impunity—in fact the traders laughed at our ships. The senior officer of a squadron had given orders to our steamers not to give chase to any vessels, because by such a course they would only be led off the station without doing any good, but to lay at anchor near the places where it was expected that slaves might be embarked. It was absurd to suppose we could put an end to the slave trade by spending £700,000 upon a squadron which was insufficient for the purpose, and that not owing to any fault of the officers or men on board the vessels themselves. In addition to this, we had had a war in the swamps of Africa in which we had lost more than half of our men without seeing an enemy, and had fought the battle of Lagos about which we had never heard a word. He maintained that we were spending a million of money in vain, and, unless we altered our tactics, the sooner we recalled our slave squadron and abandoned our forts on the coasts the better. He had himself seen service in that quarter of the world, and no one could be more anxious to see an end put to the abominable traffic in slaves, but he could not approve any policy which involved only loss of life to our men without affording us any corresponding advantage. To promote a famine by landing men when a famine already existed, and to come down to the House to ask for £2,500 for that which had cost £250,000, was nothing less than absurd.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £12,105, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the Civil Establishments on the Western Coast of Africa."

—(Sir John Hay.)

MR. WHITESIDE said, he could give an answer to the question that had been put as to what we were doing in the colony, from a letter which he had received from a gentleman who was not connected with the army, but who was residing at Cape Coast Castle. This gentleman said that the protectorate was supported by the Imperial Government at a cost of £4,000 a year for the salaries of the Governor, the Chief Justice, the Colonial Secretary, the Collector of Customs, and the Police Magistrate; besides £750 a year for house rent for the Governor and other officials. Besides that amount the Governor borrowed £2,000 a year from the military chest, but it did not appear that he ever repaid that sum. It was to be returned when the protectorate was in a position to pay it. As the receipts from the customs were about £3,000, it was evident that the protectorate would never be able to support itself. In a war the Natives refused to render the slightest aid to the Government unless they were paid high wages, and they even declined to protect their own country unless they were paid for it. The gentleman whose letter he was quoting from said that the war was useless and unjust. It was useless, because no good could come of it, as there was not a single Ashantee on the coast; and to show that it was unjust he said a chief of the Ashantees having stolen a quantity of rock gold, and according to the law of his country had incurred the penalty of death, he ran away to the protectorate and claimed protection of the Governor; upon which the King of Ashantee sent to the Governor to give up the chief; the King was invited to a conference; but he replied that he could not hold a palaver with white men. Palaver was the phrase used to designate diplomatic proceedings, and a very good word it was for the purpose. The King, therefore, returned to his own country. Our troops were sent into the bush on the 14th of April and returned in June. They again took the field in January, and remained until June, when this letter was written. Although the army had not met a single enemy, the small garrison had lost sixteen white officers, six white sergeants, and over 200 men, by fever and dysentery. Twenty-three officers had been invalidated, and many of them would never be fit for duty again. Four West India regiments arrived in two divisions in August, and most of the officers were invalidated. The military expenditure before the war was about £800 a month; it was now over £8,000, and that did not include stores sent from home. He might mention that one steamer took out £45,000 worth of stores, and received £5,000 for it. The surgeons had been particularly unfortunate, for out of five four were gone. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring) asked what was to be done to check the Governors from entering upon transactions of this character, and he (Mr. Whiteside) answered him by saying that it should be a direct Vote of Censure upon the men who, though they might not be personally answerable for the results of the war, had given it their sanction; and although his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) failed in such a Motion the other evening by some six or seven votes, yet both fact and argument were with him. It was inhuman to send our soldiers into the bush where the men died without meeting an enemy. The King of Ashantee left the climate to do the work which his troops could not so efficiently perform. Now, somebody must be responsible. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth had raised the question whether this thing should be repeated. They could not get at the Governor, but they could get at the Colonial Office. That office had acted most unwisely, and although they did not intend to do wrong, yet were they responsible. Directions had been given to abandon the stores, which cost £45,000, and the King of Ashantee would find them very useful for the next campaign. Of course arrangements were made—they always were after a Vote of Censure had been passed—for removing the survivors from the Gold Coast; but had the Government calculated what the King of Ashantee would do? Might he not come down and remove Governor Pine and the rest of them? To invade his territory was just what irritated one of these Kings most. [Mr. T. G. BARING: The territory was not invaded.] No, but the army was sent for that purpose. They went, but they did nothing. If it had been intended to march against the capital and kill the King, they might have done that, but they did not. They did nothing but suffer and die. The Colonial Office was responsible for what had taken place, for the Governor would never have made war without their consent, and they had not taken any step to alleviate the suffering they had caused until a Vote of Censure threatened them in that House.

Mr. CARDWELL: I entirely sympathize with every expression of regret for the sufferings of our soldiers on the Cape Coast, which has fallen from the hon. Member; but the right hon. Gentleman ought to have had the candour to acknowledge that the Colonial Office has done everything in its power to mitigate those sufferings the moment the news of them reached this country. The right hon. Gentleman, with that disregard for accuracy of dates which so frequently interfered with the good effect of his eloquence, has said that my proceedings were the natural result of a Vote of Censure. Now, so far from waiting for a Vote of Censure, the necessary measures were taken long before any Vote of Censure was heard of, and as soon as the news reached this country, as the right hon. Gentleman might have known if he had read the papers with any care. So, with regard to the stores also, the right hon. Gentleman might have known by reading the papers that special precaution was taken to prevent any part of the stores, particularly guns of any kind, falling into the hands of the King of Ashantee. There is quite enough to be regretted in this affair, and when we are speaking of a great public calamity it is just as well that hon. Gentlemen should be more accurate in their facts and their dates than the right hon. Gentleman has been. There are a few points on which I wish to offer an explanation to the hon. and gallant Member for Wakefield (Sir John Hay). The hon. and gallant Gentleman remarked very naturally that the item of £500 for the relief of famine was a very small one. But this item was the only sum which had been sanctioned by the Treasury as yet, and therefore was the only one proper to be introduced into the Vote. It has nothing whatever to do with the support of the troops, an item which will be included in the Military Estimates. It only related to the civil department. The hon. and gallant Baronet read a passage from a despatch of Governor Pine, in which he asked that supplies of provisions might be furnished to avert the distress which he believed would shortly exist; and in accordance with that request, with the sanction of the Treasury, twenty-seven tons of rice were sent out, at a cost of £390, which, with freight and sundries, came up to £500. Then the hon. and gallant Baronet said that this was a costly war, and that £2,000 could not possibly be the whole expense of it. That observation is, no doubt, perfectly correct. I am afraid it has been a costly war, and I am conscious of the evils of costly wars; but this item of £2,000 has nothing to do with the military expenditure—it relates only to charges incurred by the Civil Government, and civil charges only are comprised in the present Estimate. In the early part of this war the Governor sent home two items of expenditure, the first of which was £1,395, on account of this war, already paid by the Colonial Government. There was afterwards an account of £3,123 more spent in the war, but not paid, because the Colonial Government had not got the money—making a total of £4,158. The Treasury here declined to have anything to do with the £1,395, which they said was a charge properly belonging to the Colonial Government; and, with regard to the £3,123, they said they were not satisfied with the explanations they had received; but, looking to the urgency of the case, they would allow £2,000 on account until more satisfactory explanations were sent, and that is the sum set forth in this Vote. The hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams) asked me why £2,000 was given to the Governor of Sierra Leone. Now, I must remind hon. Members that there has been a greater reduction on the Colonial Estimates of late years than on many others, as hon. Members will see on looking through the Votes. For myself, I am most anxious to co-operate with the House in further reductions in these Votes, but with regard to this £2,000 it has always been included in the Estimate. The £2,000 for the steamer was a part of the settlement with the colony, and has also been always included. Whether the Government of this country should pay for its maintenance is a question very different from the use and value of that steamer, which is undoubted and cannot be disputed. Of all the accessories of a colonial establishment a steamer, doing the work which this does, is the most valuable. Portions of the settlement are removed 150 miles from the mouth of the river, and the steamer affords the inhabitants a most invaluable means of communication. With regard to the £3,125 for buildings and works at Lagos, that sum is for buildings required in the colony, such as a court-house, buildings for the Customs' service, a powder magazine, &c.

I believe I have now answered the questions which were put to me in detail, and all that remains for me is to notice the weighty matters referred to in the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, who opened this discussion. I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend in most of the principles which he has laid down. I think the object of this country in establishing a settlement on the West Coast of Africa cannot be a self-interested one, having in view the increase of the wealth of England. The great design which has always interested this country in connection with our proceedings on that coast is the repression of the slave trade, and with it the introduction of legitimate commerce and of Christianity as the civilizing agent of mankind. An extension of territory in that country would be what no one would wish to see carried into effect; and certainly any desire of aggrandizement or territorial acquisition there would be foreign to our purpose and alien to our policy. What our policy should be and is was well laid down by a Committee of 1842, of which Lord Derby, Earl Russell, Mr. Speaker, and other distinguished men were Members. Speaking of the Western Coast of Africa they said—

“The relation of the Native tribes to the English Crown should be not the allegiance of subjects to which we have no right to pretend, and which it would entail an inconvenient responsibility to possess, but the deference of weaker Powers to a stronger and more enlightened neighbour, whose protection and counsel they seek, and to whom they are bound by certain definite obligations.”

That policy may be right or it may be wrong—I am not now arguing that question; but in Lord Grey's book our policy is described in the same sense, and as it is the policy to which this country has adhered, I hold with my right hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth that to extend our territorial possessions on the West Coast of Africa is not the most desirable mode of giving it effect. Such a system of acquisition would be attended with many evils which, as far as possible, should be avoided. I am asked what the view of the Government is with respect to expeditions into the interior of Africa? I may answer that question by pointing to the policy which we have endeavoured to give effect to in reference to the expedition which has been brought under direct discussion. We have sent out orders to put an end, if possible, to expeditions on the Gold Coast. With respect to Lagos, I anticipated these discussions by announcing to the Governor of Lagos that our policy was to be one of abstaining from taking part in the disputes among Natives. A war that has been raging there between two tribes is very mischievous to trade, and inflicts great suffering on the Natives; but I do not think it would have been right for us to take a part in it, or to endeavour to put an end to it by force. It is difficult to lay down in clear terms what the details of a policy are. Those details must be complicated and difficult where our object is not the usual one of acquiring wealth or extending our power, but where our policy is solely and entirely a disinterested one—namely, at great inconvenience and no inconsiderable sacrifices to ourselves, to abolish a traffic disgraceful to human nature, and extend the advantages of religion, civilization, and legitimate commerce to the miserable inhabitants of Africa.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he believed that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies had done all that could be done in the case which had been brought so prominently under the notice of the House. He thought that of the papers now before Parliament the most satisfactory one of all was the despatch of the right hon. Gentleman, in which certainly he showed a determination to apply a remedy to an existing evil, and to prevent a recurrence of the unfortunate complications and embarrassments that had given rise to it. But, unhappily, these steps had been taken too late. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring) that under such circumstances remedial measures must come too late. That was the point which they had to consider. It was difficult to fix a censure and to say who was to blame, and, even if it was not, censure would be too late. What they wanted to do was to prevent a recurrence of circumstances in which it was useless to blame any one for disaster, and in respect to which information came too late. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies had stated to the House the expenditure which we had incurred accurately according to the Returns which had reached him; but he doubted whether these Returns gave all the military expenditure for recent operations.

MR. CARDWELL: It was not the military expenditure. I said we were on the Civil Service Estimates, and that these were expenses incurred by the Civil Government on account of the war.

MR. ADDERLEY: He was, then, quite correct in thinking that they had not before them an estimate of the expenditure for the whole of the affair. The present case afforded a striking exemplification of the mistaken policy we had adopted on that coast. The policy of setting up a protecting Power on the West Coast of Africa was both wasteful and mischievous, and he took this opportunity of giving notice that on the first day of next Session he should move for a Select Committee, which might inquire into the whole subject, with the view of preventing a recurrence of such evils as those which we were now lamenting. By assuming the task of protecting barbarous tribes, we not only scattered our army to an unnecessary extent, but exposed our troops to a demoralizing and deadly service—not only by warfare, but by the pestilential climate of some of the most unhealthy parts of the world. It was folly enough for us to assist great colonies as vigorous as ourselves in their wars for self-defence, without setting up Protectorates on the coast of Africa to which barbarous tribes would look for aid in mutual hostilities, and for plunder for themselves. We have had experience enough to show us how insane a policy this was, and the sooner we backed out of it the better. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies told them he had written to the Governor of Lagos, urging as the wish of the Government a pacific policy. But would the Governor, with the English flag and the English Exchequer at his back, carry out the wishes and intentions of the Government in that respect? He would remind the right hon. Gentleman and the Committee of the saying of the first Napoleon, that the true policy of this country was to concentrate our forces at home, and send them abroad as they might be required; not to scatter them, as we do, in every direction, in search of service, and embroil ourselves with all the world; and he said that it was fortunate for mankind we so wasted our strength, which concentrated would make us almost too powerful for the rest of the world. It was said that the policy adopted by this country was necessary in the interests of commerce and of civilization. But the fact was that commerce was disturbed and impeded by such a policy. Look at what had taken place in the present instance. Governor Pine wrote home to say that it was useless talking of peace, for he had an arduous task to perform in defending an extensive line of coast, bordered by tribes, some of whom were under British protection, while they had rivals under other protection; and he seemed to have grand notions of his position, calling upon the Home Government to support him, but fortunately calling in vain. The time had come, he wrote rather magniloquently, when the question must be settled now and for ever, whether the English flag was to be trampled on by savage and sanguinary tribes. But, surely, there was a prior question to be settled, namely, whether the English flag should be trailed about all over the world as an Irishman trailed his coat-tails at a fair, to be trodden on and insulted by any one who had nothing to do, and nothing to lose. Governor Pine thought that good policy, economy, and mercy would be served by sending him a force sufficient to decide at once and for ever the supremacy of England over African barbarians. The House of Commons would probably be of opinion that none of these results would be so insured. Major Cochrane and Commander Wilnot both cautioned the Governor that the House of Commons would never stand such a course; but he was blind to their remonstrances, pressed on the Colonial Office the necessity of doing what he asked, and at last quarrelled with these two officers because they had so wisely cautioned him not to quarrel with the King of Ashantee. What made the absurdity the greater was, as appeared from Governor Pine's own statement, the war he proposed could only be carried on by the sacrifice for the time of the chief object for which we maintained this settlement—namely, by suspending our efforts for the abolition of the slave trade. He (Mr. Adderley) deprecated strongly the policy of sentimental colonization which was too much adopted by this country. He considered that a better case than this could hardly be brought forward to illustrate the impolicy of the course we were pursuing in this direction. He thought the time had now come to consider whether we had any inducement for exposing our officers and men any longer in a climate so deadly that when it was proposed at the end of the American war to make West Africa a convict station, Mr. Burke made a celebrated speech in this House, in which he described it as a place where "all death lives and all life dies"—a place too dreadful even for criminals to be sent there in commutation for death. He should take the first opportunity next Session of moving for a Committee of Inquiry into the use of our West African establishments, and he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies to enable him to prepare for it, and to have in readiness the evidence which would be necessary for a fair investigation. He hoped that that inquiry would lead to the abandonment of the Gold Coast forts, and the concentration of our settlements, or disposal of them otherwise. The right hon. Gentleman said that he was against all extension of our possessions on this coast. But with the best intentions this extension was going on, and would continue to go on unless they resolutely set their faces against it. Fifteen years ago the Gold Coast was only a lieutenant governorship under Sierra Leone. Then it was constituted a governorship. During Earl Grey's tenure of the Colonial Office we purchased the Danish forts there for £10,000; and the Dutch forts were now being offered us for sale. If, as the result of the inquiry he proposed, the Government could see their way clear to withdraw from the Gold Coast, and concentrate their forces in two places, or even in one, upon this coast, the greatest benefit would result from the appointment of a Committee. It should be remembered that whatever our squadron might have done for checking the slave trade, no such end had yet been in the least advanced by the troops, whom we had employed on shore, for they could do nothing but embroil us with the tribes along the coast, while they certainly did nothing for the civilization of the country. The slave trade could be best repressed by a differently composed squadron on the coast, and he quite agreed that it would be well to have faster and fewer vessels there. He hoped, however, that the Protectorate would be abandoned, for the only result had been a large loss of valuable lives, while neither commerce, nor suppression of the slave trade, nor civilization of the tribes, had apparently been promoted by it.

Mr. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman was resolved to move for a Committee next Session: if he had not made the announcement he (Mr. Henry Seymour) should have done so himself, for he wished to see the whole question ventilated. He hoped, however, that in the meanwhile the Colonial Office would have devised some better means of managing the affairs of these settlements. He must say, however, that he thought the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) was riding his hobby too hard when he designed to confine England to the limits of these Islands; it seemed to him (Mr. Henry Seymour) absurd to talk of restraining this nation within such narrow limits.

Mr. ADDERLEY said, what he desired was to restrict the number of our forces abroad.

Mr. HENRY SEYMOUR remarked, that the natural course for a people so powerful, vigorous, and enterprising as that of England was to expand and to occupy nearly every region of the world; and if Napoleon had seen the present wealth, power, and influence of this country in all parts of the world, he would have approved the policy of the British Government for the last thirty or forty years. As to the outcry about these paltry military expenses, he would ask how our colonies could have become so prosperous if they had not been aided in their weakness by the mother country? While our colonies and possessions added largely, on the whole, to the wealth of the mother country, there must necessarily be some which, like the territories of the United States, required for a time an expenditure from the mother country in order that they might become the sources of wealth to the generation which followed. Instead, therefore, of restricting our present policy, he would extend it still further; and if this question were debated he should be prepared to prove, that our expenditure all over the world was returned to us a hundred-fold by the prosperity of our colonies and possessions. Take the case of Ceylon—we were now exporting from that colony 40,000,000 lb. of coffee a year, and British capital there was to a great extent bringing 10, 20, and 30 per cent per annum to those who laid it out. The imports into this country from the West Coast were increasing, but the products from the interior could not be obtained without the aid of posts established upon the coast; whereas on the east coast, where there were no British settlements, it appeared from accounts given by Captain Speke, that at a short distance from Mozambique towards the interior, the price of Manchester goods increased 2,500 per cent, in consequence of the difficulty, from want of possessions on the coast, of causing the goods to penetrate into the interior. Until they broke the outer crust of the continent they could not gain the interior. Then let them look to the progress of civilization. He thought the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) could not have examined the position of Sierra Leone and the Gambia, where schools and missionary stations were established, whereby Christianity and civilization had been extended, as well as commerce promoted. Then as to the suppression of the slave trade—Commodore Wilmot, in a valuable minute on the subject, had proposed the occupation of Quettah, as a means of putting an end to the slave trade on the only part of the western coast of Africa where it still prevailed to any extent. He wished to observe that our vessels on the coast were most inadequate in speed; not one of them could go more than nine miles an hour, whereas the slavers were notoriously the fastest vessels that could be built. It had been said that this squadron, besides its proper duties in suppressing the slave trade, could be relied upon as a squadron of reserve in case of war; but it would be of very little use against the fast vessels of other nations. He did not find fault with the policy of the Government, but with the way in which that policy was carried out. Why, slavery was acknowledged in British courts of justice in the limits of the Protectorate! We had done away with protectorates almost everywhere, and he did not see why the protectorates on the Gold Coast should not be done away with also. Reference had been made to the Dutch possessions, and the Minister for the Colonies was aware that a movement was taking place in the Chamber in Holland with regard to the Gold Coast, and it was said there, "either let us have our affairs managed better, or sell the territory to the British Government." The estimate of the revenue which might be obtained from these possessions was £50,000 a year. The cost of management was £20,000. Now, if we could settle the question satisfactorily with the Dutch the customs revenue might be divided, and the colony be made self-supporting. The climate was not so bad as had been represented, and was not nearly so injurious to health as the Gambia and Sierra Leone; and he trusted the Government would not abandon the coast, but that next year the subject would be thoroughly sifted by a Select Committee. There was one great defect in the Estimates, for it was impossible to ascertain how much these colonies cost this country. The civil expenditure was set out, but there was no statement as to the naval and military expenditure. The House ought to be furnished with an estimate of the expenditure of each colony. He believed that if we entered into any well-devised scheme for the suppression of the slave trade, Lagos would form an important portion of that scheme; but all the efforts that had hitherto been made had failed from want of administrative ability, for neither Mr. Freeman, at Lagos, nor Mr. Taylor, at Abeokuta, had conformed to the habits of the people. He should like to know when the account of the military expenditure of the Ashantee war would be laid upon the table, and what was its estimated cost for the coming year. It was understood that the Vote was to be postponed until that statement could be laid before the House, and until the policy of the Government could be explained. The question had been shirked by one Member of the Government, because it was not in his department, and he thought the responsible member of the Cabinet ought not to consider it beneath his dignity to give the necessary explanation as to the civil and military expenditure.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had misunderstood the remarks of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley). He did not understand that his right hon. Friend had stated his intention of moving for a Committee to inquire into the whole subject, but that the question of the Protectorate was one which ought to be inquired into; and in that opinion he (Mr. A. Mills) fully concurring. He should be sorry if the investigation was directed to particular acts of the Government on the Gold Coast. With respect to the policy which had been pursued by this country, people were asking who was to blame—the Admiralty, the War Office, or the Colonial Department? But if any body was to blame it was not any particular Ministry, or any one official Department, but Parliament itself, which had allowed a system to go on which might at any time explode in disasters similar to those at Lagos or the Gold Coast. He trusted the attention of Parliament would be aroused to the subject, and that an inquiry would be instituted for the purpose of ascertaining whether an attempt to protect the Native tribes was a wise course, and one likely to extinguish the hateful traffic which had been so long carried on. The case of Lagos showed one of the most remarkable failures of our policy resulting from an attempt to interfere in the quarrels of the Native tribes. That colony was founded for the purpose of extinguishing the slave trade; and no doubt that was a very laudable object, in which the country would sympathize if it could be carried out without an undue sacrifice of life and treasure. But what had been the result? Why, when Abeokuta was invaded, it had to depend on supplies of powder from Porto Novo, which was supplied by French traders in exchange for slaves. So that this colony of Lagos, which was planted for the specific purpose of abolishing the slave trade, became, through the foolish policy of the Governor, the means of carrying it on. How could they expect a proper man for Governor of such a colony as Lagos when the salary was only £500, not enough to tempt a country apothecary in fair practice? The whole question of our protectorate over Native tribes ought to be fairly and impartially discussed. The country did not grudge a moderate expenditure for the suppression of the slave trade, but it did grudge the indefinite expenditure involved in protecting Native tribes.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the hon. and gallant Member for Wakefield (Sir John Hay) had quoted a private letter from a personal friend, in which it was stated that our squadron on the coast of Africa was unable to cope with the slave trade. A similar statement was made the other night, when he (Lord Clarence Paget) stated that he had no knowledge of any slaver having escaped from our squadron after a fair chase.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he should be happy to supply his noble Friend with the information.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the statement of his hon. and gallant Friend was, that in spite of four steamers the slaver got away. All he could say was, that he had heard nothing of such a case, nor had any information to that effect reached the Admiralty. His hon. and gallant Friend said that positive orders had been given to the various ships composing the squadron not to leave their station for the purpose of chasing slavers. But his hon. and gallant Friend knew that if our vessels were to leave their station it would be one of the most advantageous things that could happen for the slave dealers, as they would immediately take the opportunity of despatching slave ships during the temporary absence of the station ship. It was quite possible that a certain number of fast American steamers might be employed in the trade, and no doubt it would be advisable to match them by faster ships; but we wanted fast steamers all over the world, and to send a fresh squadron to the coast of Africa every year because fast American steamers were sent there would be attended with great inconvenience. The Admiralty were perfectly alive to the subject, and would not neglect any opportunity for providing for any contingency.

MR. MONSELL said, the question before the Committee was, whether they should practically pass a Vote of Censure upon the Government by withdrawing this sum of £2,500. Now, it seemed to him most unfair to cast the blame for the present state of things upon the Government, who were simply carrying out a policy inaugurated in 1842 upon the recommendation of a Committee of which Lord Derby was a Member, and adopted by successive Colonial Secretaries. The occasion of this war really was that the King of Ashantee had threatened the extermination of tribes which we were bound to protect, and the Government would have been wanting in their duty, if they had declined to afford their assistance. The loss of life on the occasion was, no doubt, to be deplored; but according to Commodore Wilmot, if Major Cochrane had done his duty our troops would have marched to the capital of the King of Ashantee, and it was impossible for the Government to provide that all their officers serving on distant stations should be as efficient as could be desired.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he had no wish to put the House to the trouble of dividing upon the Vote. The only reason why he had urged upon the Government the necessity of suspending the Vote, was that the sum of £2,500 altogether inadequately represented the expenses entailed upon the country by this war. He thought the Government ought to have laid a supplementary estimate upon the table, showing the expenses already incurred for this calamitous war. He believed that something like £250,000 had been expended, of which only this small item of £2,500 was to be found in the Votes.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, no statement of the military expenses incurred in this war had been laid on the table by the War Department, because it was quite impossible that such a statement could be made. The war had taken place in this and the last year, and the accounts for the military expenditure of last year were not yet laid upon the table, nor could they be included in this year's Estimates; but the commissariat charges and field allowances had been taken at an increased amount, in case the war should continue. The expense of organizing a large transport corps had been estimated, but it would be absolutely delusive to attempt to lay on the table an account of the actual expenses incurred. When the Army Expenditure of 1863 was laid before the House, it would be seen what expenditure the war had entailed.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR asked if he was to understand the noble Marquess to say that all the military estimates were two years behindhand?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Not the Estimates, but the account of the military expenditure.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, the Government for some time had been spending £1,200 a month for this war, and an account of the estimated expenditure ought to be laid upon the table, as he believed was done in the case of the China and Crimean wars.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the expenses, so far as could be done, had been included in the Estimates which had been laid before the House; but the war was going on at the time.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, it would be quite possible to give an approximate estimate of the expenses from time to time. To get an estimate two years after the event was of no use. It might as well not be printed.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR asked, how

it happened that while we were voting £2,000 a year in aid of the Government of the Gold Coast, the magnificent tanks which were in the country had been out of repair, so that no water could be had? He should move to reduce this Vote by £500, the salary of the Governor of Lagos, unless he should receive an assurance that Mr. Freeman was to be removed.

MR. ADDERLEY asked for an explanation of the circumstance that Governor Pine was adverse to raising any taxes in the colony itself. He said in one of his despatches he had neither the face nor the courage to do so.

MR. CARDWELL said, that owing to the invasion of the King of Ashantee and the extraordinary severity of the season, there had been a great famine and great distress in the colony, and the passage to which his right hon. Friend had referred related to that state of things. It was only when the revenue of the colony was deficient that that House was asked to defray the expense. He had received no information as to why the tanks had been suffered to go out of repair. They ought to have been kept in repair out of the revenue of the colony itself. The salary of Mr. Freeman, at Lagos, was made up in this way—£500 was taken for him as Consul in the Consular Estimate, and £500 for him as Governor in that Vote.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman could give the Committee an estimate of what the revenue of Lagos was?

MR. CARDWELL said, that in 1862, the last year of which he had any account, it was £7,120. The Estimate for the present year was considerably larger.

LORD HARRY VANE quite agreed with the noble Marquess, that an exact estimate of the war expenses could not be furnished, but he did not see why an approximate estimate could not. It might be right or wrong to pursue the policy which we had adopted on the Gold Coast, but then it had been followed ever since 1842.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, his belief was that in the matter between Lagos and Abbeokuta the former was more sinned against than sinning. He held out hopes last year that Lagos would this year be able to pay its own expenses, and such was his belief at the time. But the reason why they were now obliged to ask a slight assistance for the colony was mainly because the neighbouring tribes had persisted in waging war among themselves, and because Abbeokuta, in spite of our advice, had carried on hostilities against its neighbours. He hoped that people would not be too elated by their recent victory over the King of Dahomey to adopt a policy of peace, that the trade of Lagos would make great advances, and that the colony would become self-supporting.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, it was a personal question with the people of Lagos.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, they were not fighting with Mr. Freeman—it was their neighbours that were fighting.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, that the people of Abbeokuta had not been on good terms with them since Mr. Freeman had become Governor.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he understood that the military correspondence was to have been laid upon the table, but it had not as yet been produced.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was not aware that the military correspondence had been promised.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he should move for it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) £220,000, Iron clad ships El Tousson and El Monassir.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the Committee was perfectly aware of all the circumstances which had led the Government to recommend this purchase to Parliament, and therefore he would not take up time by making any statement upon the subject. He should be very happy, however, to answer any questions which might be put to him.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

NEW ZEALAND GUARANTEE OF LOAN BILL.—[BILL 150].—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he hoped they should receive from the Colonial Secretary a more satisfactory statement than had yet been given as to the nature of the security which was to be good enough for that House but was not good enough for the merchants of the City. Unless he could elicit some such statement from the right hon. Gentleman, he felt disposed to move that a Select Committee be now appointed to inquire into the relative financial position of Great Britain and New Zealand, with a view to a final adjustment of any outstanding balance of accounts between them, and to a fair understanding as to how the liabilities of either country were to be borne in future. When a former loan of £500,000 was asked, in 1857, a Committee of Inquiry was appointed; but now, at the end of the Session, when there was little opportunity for discussion, the Government came down with a high-handed proposal, without giving the House a proper account of the security on which that guarantee was to rest. As soon as the guaranteed part of the loan was put upon the market nobody would have anything to do with the unguaranteed part of it; so that this proposal would not really effect its professed object. He must tell the Government frankly that their colonial policy of late years had not been such as to entitle them to the blind confidence of the House of Commons for the next six months. He was prepared to incur the expense of defending New Zealand against any foreign attack; but when such extensive powers of self-government had been placed in the hands of the colonists, he was not ready to consent to undertake the responsibility of internal wars like the present. The House was bound in duty not to leave such a question open for the future; and unless the Government gave some satisfactory explanation of the course they intended to pursue during the next six months he would, by way of precaution, move the appointment of a Select Committee.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire what is the relative financial position of Great Britain and New Zealand, with a view of a definite and final adjustment of any outstanding balance, and coming to an understanding as to the liabilities to be borne in future by the Government of either Country,"—(Sir John Trelawny,—instead thereof.

GENERAL PEEL: Sir, before the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) answers the hon. Baronet, I wish to put this question to him:—What power has the Government of New Zealand in directing the movement of the British troops in that colony? I ask that question in consequence of having seen a private letter from New Zealand, and which, being private, I cannot read to the House. The first question raised by the writer is—Why were we in Taranga at all? and he says it was because it was so willed by three lawyers, members of the Colonial Government, contrary to the direct wishes of the Governor; because this triumvirate, under the fiction of responsible Government, overrules the representative of the Queen, overrules the commander of 10,000 troops, overrules the expenditure of £1,500,000 of other people's money, and overrules the wishes of the Native race which is not represented at all in the political system. And this is the Colonial self-government which the Duke of Newcastle upholds! The writer then goes on to inquire, how it is that the representatives of 100,000 colonists, consisting of Englishmen, Irishmen, Scotchmen, Germans, and Yankees, have the control over an unlimited expenditure of British money and British blood? He says the war has proceeded from these representatives themselves—that it arose in consequence of their calling upon Colonel Browne in the first instance to use British troops for the purpose of taking the land of the Native British subjects—a measure that roused that rebellion which you are now required to put down. He says in respect to the military operations—and I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he can to answer this—he says that our going to Taranga was the greatest mistake that ever was made. He says this place is distant about 150 miles from Auckland; that it is accessible by sea; and we can easily transport our troops thither; but when they have got there they are separated by 50 miles of bad country, a wood of 12 miles, the Thames river and its swampy valley, and the Waikato river, from our posts at Maungatantari; whereas this 50 miles is a two days' march for a light-armed Native force; and the country between is in their hands. On the contrary our men have to come back 150 miles by sea, 35 to the Waikato, and to ascend 100 miles of the river to get back to Maungatantari; so that while our General with his 3,000 men is practically shut up by woods, hills, and swamps, it is in the power of the Maori General (if they have one) to resume the offensive on the Waikato with a concentrated force. The fact, he says, is that—“If the Maories did not make it a point of honour to fight each man for his own land, they might have led the General from Taranga to Waikato and from Waikato to Taranga, as would have exhausted his patience in command, and Mr. Gladstone's in paying the bill. Instead of this they have dug their intrenched camps on the open ground, sometimes without provisions, once even without water, and then they have braved four or five times their own number, and all our Armstrong guns, mortars, howitzers, and hand grenades, when they might have gone into the bush, and from thence cut off our convoys and orderlies without much loss to themselves, but with vast injury to us. Their one feeling is, if the land dies let us die with it.”

I wish, therefore, to know what control the Colonial Government have over the movements of the troops in New Zealand, or whether the control rests with the Governor? When we look at the fearful calamity which has taken place—for I can call it by no other name—when we see the prestige of one of the finest regiments in the British service shaken—of that regiment with respect to which Sir William Napier in his History says he was congratulated by everybody on being placed in command of such a corps—that regiment which stormed the breach of Badajoz—that regiment, as we are now informed, has retired before the Natives of New Zealand. And what was the reason of that? Why, it was because every commanding officer in the regiment was killed upon the spot. Sir, an hon. Member of this House once told us, that if all our generals, our colonels, and other officers were swallowed up by an earthquake, their places could easily be replaced. I only hope that that hon. Gentleman's constituency will find it much easier to supply his place than it will be to supply the place of the lowest officer who fell on this occasion. I have to ask another question—How is the increased expenditure for the war to be met? The great increase in the Army Estimates was put down to the New Zealand war. We were told that, in consequence of that expense, it was necessary to reduce the expense of the Yeomanry force. The Vote against that reduction was carried by a majority of only one. Then came a demonstration from the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, who suddenly announced that, in consequence of the excellent news that had been received from New Zealand, the Government were enabled to forego their determination of not calling out the Yeomanry for exercise or permanent duty. But when the Estimates were brought forward, every one of the Votes was reduced. How, then, are these expenses to be paid? We have heard that no estimate can be given of the expenditure on the Ashantee war; and I have been trying to impress on the House the necessity of asking some more satisfactory answer than we have yet received. If we cannot have accounts of expenditure within two years, they can be of very little use after. I wish to know from the Colonial Secretary, has the Colonial Government the power of directing the movement of Her Majesty's forces in New Zealand, and how is it proposed to make up for the reduction in the Army Estimates in consequence of the excellent news from New Zealand?

MR. CARDWELL: My right hon. Friend has put to me a Question which I understand to be this—In whom rests the control and command of the Queen's forces in New Zealand?—does it rest with the Colonial Minister or with the Colonial Governor? My right hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State read the other night an extract of the despatch of the Duke of Newcastle, in which the government of Native affairs was given over to the Colonial Minister, but in which the control, command, and management of the Queen's forces was exclusively placed in the Governor of the colony. The Correspondence has been laid on the table. I have stated the views of Her Majesty's Government with reference to the policy that ought to be pursued in reference to the land question, and the feeling of the House appeared to be favourable to those views. But they were already in writing, for it so happened that the post left that very day, and they went by that day's post to New Zealand; and they have been laid on the table of this House. They were intended to obviate the risk and possibility of war arising from a desire of making the forces of the Queen subservient to taking land from the Natives. So much for the general policy; but with regard to the control of the Governor over the troops, I will read an extract from a despatch which I addressed to the Governor, and which is also on the table. It is dated the 26th of May, and is in these words—

"I entirely anticipate that your Ministers will be animated by a just sense of the exertions and sacrifices which have already been made by the mother country for the colony, and that on colonial grounds they will be as anxious as you will be yourself to terminate the present hostilities. But it is my duty to say to you plainly that if, unfortunately, their opinion should be different from your own as to the terms of peace, Her Majesty's Government expect you to act on your own judgment, and to state to your Ministers explicitly that an army of 10,000 English troops has been placed at your disposal for objects of great Imperial concern, and not for the attainment of any merely local object—that your responsibility to the Crown is paramount, and that you will not continue the expenditure of blood and treasure longer than is absolutely necessary for the establishment of a just and enduring peace."

I do not know how it would be possible for language to express more plainly with whom the control rests, and what is the expectation of the Government with regard to the exercise of that control. But further, by a subsequent mail information reached me of a difference between the Governor and his Ministers with regard to the treatment of 183 prisoners who had been taken in action—not that there was any charge of cruelty in their treatment if they were to be kept as prisoners, but that there was a difference of opinion between the Governor and his Ministers whether they should be treated as prisoners at all. I addressed a despatch to the Governor on the subject. I have not a copy of it with me, but I am quite sure I state it correctly when I say that I told the Governor that I looked to him for determining a question of that kind—that I wished him to obtain the concurrence of his Ministers if he could; but if not, he should decide without their concurrence, and that I should be perfectly prepared to support him if I found from subsequent despatches that he had taken that course. I think I have completely answered the question proposed to me by my right hon. Friend. Now, with regard to the origin of this war. My right hon. Friend read a letter with reference to the origin of the former war, which took place in the time of Governor Browne. I do not mean to say there is no connection between the present and the former war; but this I say—Governor Grey went in 1861 as a governor of peace, and he abstained from insisting on the terms prescribed by Governor Browne. He was regarded by the Natives as their friend—he told them that the King movement would not be the cause of war, and he withdrew by proclamation that fatal blot which had been the cause of the former war. I stated that Governor Grey held the origin of the war to be a conspiracy of chiefs of a particular district, who had been preparing for an attack on Auckland. But it was no part of Governor Grey's policy, and certainly it was no part of the policy of the Government, to maintain an army and continue a war for any purpose of oppression to the Natives of New Zealand. But I was a little surprised to learn from the hon. Member for Tavistock (Sir John Trelawny) that I had given no evidence with regard to the security on which this loan was to be raised. I should have been afraid, sitting in judgment on myself, that I had occupied the time of the House too long on the subject of the security for this loan. I certainly stated what was to be the security pledged—that it was to be all the revenue of which the New Zealand Assembly has the command. I stated the ordinary revenue for the year ending June 30, 1863, as it appears in the papers before the House; I also stated the estimated revenue for the following year. I showed, I thought, to the satisfaction of the House, that there was an adequate, ample security in the ordinary revenue of the colony; but in addition to that there was another considerable revenue arising from land sales. The way in which this loan comes to be proposed is this:—Last year an offer was made by my noble Friend the Duke of Newcastle to ask the House to guarantee a loan of £500,000 for New Zealand—£200,000 for the expenses of the former war, £200,000 for compensation to settlers for losses incurred in that war, and £100,000 for the purposes of the colony. That proposal only passed the first stage last Session, and it fell to me to redeem the pledge in the course of the present Session. But in the meantime a further liability of £300,000 had arisen from the circumstances of the present war, and if the guarantee were limited to £500,000, almost the whole of it would come to the Treasury. There is a great expense incurred by the mother country, but there is also a great expense on the part of the colony. They have to pay the expense of a local force of 10,000 men in arms against the Natives. The payment which the colony makes to this country for the Imperial troops in New Zealand is under an arrangement which terminates at the close of the present year. It is, I must admit, an unsatisfactory arrangement. There is a nominal payment of £5 per head per man, but the larger portion of that sum finds its way back to the Treasury of the colony. It is a part of the present proposal that this arrangement shall terminate, and that the payment by New Zealand should be the same as by the Australian colonies—namely, £40 per man per annum, from the beginning of 1865. All this is given in detail in the papers before the House. It will be seen that, in consideration of the arrangements recited in the letters of Sir Frederick Rogers and the repayment of all the debts due from the colony to the Treasury, it is proposed to guarantee this loan of £1,000,000. I have already stated my belief that the security is quite ample. Of this I am sure, that it is desirable that all running accounts between the Treasury and the colony should be closed, and that a substantial arrangement should be made for the payment of Imperial troops, so that it may be no longer a matter of indifference to the colony whether they provoke a war or not. Considering, however, that the colonists are now engaged in a formidable struggle—that all those of age to bear arms in the province of Auckland are under arms for the defence of their hearths and homes—that they are removed from the productive pursuits of industry—that they are incurring vast expenses, and that this beneficial arrangement has been made between the colony and the mother country, I trust that the hon. Gentleman having fully discharged his public duty, will permit the House to go into Committee on this Bill, on the distinct understanding that the Lords of the Treasury will not advance any money until the Assembly of New Zealand have formally adopted the terms of the arrangement.

MAJOR HAMILTON said, that as the House had been told that a portion of this loan would be employed in compensating the colonists who lost their all in the last war, he trusted that compensation would also be given to those who had lost their property in the present war. There was, for example, the case of Mr. Calvert, who was sitting by his own fireside when his child was murdered by the Natives. He rushed out, was wounded while gallantly fighting, and his property was destroyed. He hoped that a part of the money would be employed in making good these losses.

COLONEL SYKES must repeat his objections to this Bill, and to the entire policy of guaranteeing colonial loans. The war was part of a system of continued aggression on the Natives for the ultimate purpose of extermination. Then as to the guarantee, what was it? The revenue of the colony was stated to be £700,000 per annum, but the expense of 10,000 troops at £40 per man would be £400,000. Then there were the items of the payment of local troops, the interest of the debt, compensation to sufferers, and the local government expenses. After these charges had been met, what would become of the security? The revenues of the colony, too, were not in the hands of the Treasury but under the control of local Ministries, which were ephemeral; and although they might have an honest Government now, you might have a democratic one to-morrow and then they would never get their money. [A laugh!] Although he was a Liberal himself, he believed that under such democratic Governments as existed there they could never be certain of the Government, and that their guarantee was good for nothing. If any one would divide with him, he would oppose the Bill.

Mr. WHALLEY protested against it being said that this was a war of aggression against the Natives; the war had nothing to do with land, but originated entirely in the massacre of some of our troops. He wished also to say that Sir George Grey had stated in New Zealand that he had traced the origin of this war to the Roman Catholic Missionaries. He put the question on a former occasion three times in one night, and he received for answer that it was too late to discuss the matter. Too late to put such a question! He spent nearly a whole day at the Colonial Office on the subject, and he was told there were floating recollections in the minds of the officials there that some such communication had been received. He then put the question in the House, and cited the Canadian rebellion and other recent cases; but only got for answer that the loyalty of the Canadians was unimpeachable, and that it was absurd to cite them in reference to New Zealand. He wished for a distinct answer, and if he did not receive it he would ask the House to grant him a return of all the communications which had been received from Sir George Grey relative to the origin and progress of the war.

Mr. ARTHUR MILLS said, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (General Peel) had called attention to the immense mischief likely to arise if the practice prevailing in New Zealand were persisted in, of allowing the responsible Ministers of the Governor to dictate to the Commander of the forces with reference to the movement of the troops in that province. It was said by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell), that he had written a despatch which, if attended to, would have the effect of preventing the recurrence of such a bad practice in future. But he (Mr. Arthur Mills) wished to call the attention of the House to the very difficult position in which they were placed with regard to the consequences, or rather probable want of consequences, resulting from that despatch. It was the fact, however, as appeared from the papers before the House, that the practice had prevailed, and as long as the present system continued it was likely to prevail—the practice of dictation in these matters by the responsible Ministers of the Governor; and it was questionable how far any despatch from the Colonial Office could put an end to it. As an illustration, he might mention that the Deputy Commissary General remonstrated against an attempt made not very long ago—and which, indeed, was carried out—of advancing lump sums from the Treasury chest, as £100,000 at a time, for the payment of the militia of New Zealand, for which ostensibly it was the duty of the Colonial Government to provide. The Governor referred the matter to these Ministers, who said that it was absolutely necessary the sum should be advanced, considering the exigencies of the colony, and that it should be repaid in three months. That sum had never been repaid. The simple fact was that the Ministers dictated to the Governor, who acted under compulsion. He wanted to know what despatch written from the Colonial Office would prevent the continuance of the practice? The despatch might be sent out, but the responsible Ministers of the Governor would say, “We cannot hold office on these terms—we will resign.” Their successors would do the same, a succession of crises would occur, and in the end the Governor would be forced to yield. If such practices were allowed to go on, and the responsible Ministers of the Governor were allowed to spend money voted by Parliament, the result would be indefinitely to prolong the war. Then again, in the time, he believed, of Governor Browne, the Commander of the forces said that in his judgment the troops ought to be sent to a certain part of the province. The Minister of New Zealand said, “Oh, I trust you will do nothing of the kind. I have property there, and I shall have to begin life again if you send them there.” The Minister was all powerful, and prevented the arrangement which the Commander of the forces wanted to carry out. Now, as to the origin of the war, the right hon. Gentleman said the Natives were the cause of it, and the colonists had nothing to do with it. He had that morning received a letter from Mr. Gorst—a gentleman who had written a very able and intelligent book on these transactions in New Zealand—in which letter Mr. Gorst, speaking of the allegation that the war was the result of a conspiracy of the Maories, expressed his absolute disbelief of it from the personal knowledge derived from a residence on the spot some time before the war broke out. Tales of such plots, he added, were common during the whole time of his residence in New Zealand, many of them, to his certain knowledge, utterly false. He stated further that he could undertake to disprove the existence of half-a-dozen former plots stated upon evidence as credible as that upon the faith of which Waikato was invaded. This confirmed the opinion which he had formed upon information received from both civil and military authorities; and when distinguished military authorities expressed their opinion that the Queen's troops were being employed in carrying on an unrighteous war, not to protect the lives and property of the people of Auckland, but to enable the colonists to get as much fertile land as they could, and a small knot of persons in Auckland to coin fortunes out of the commissariat, he did think that it behoved the House of Commons to interfere.

Mr. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, he rose at the request of several of his Friends to read an extract from a letter which he had received since the right hon. Gentleman had begun his speech. The writer, who was known to many Members of the House, and for whose shrewdness and ability he could answer, and who, though now within a few miles of the seat of war in New Zealand, till about fifteen months ago knew as little about that country as most hon. Members did now, after describing an engagement in which of 400 Natives 200 had been killed or wounded continued—

"They are a brave race, and it seems a great shame to take their land from them. We all out here consider the war an unjust one. But the cry of the colonists is still for land. Moreover, the troops are the making of Auckland, as contractors and that kind of people are making large fortunes. So long, therefore, as you are fools enough to supply the needful, so long will they keep on the war. General Cameron has captured millions of acres which a few months ago belonged to the Natives."

He then went on, after expressing an opinion that this winter might starve out the Natives, to give a deplorable account of the repulse which our troops had sustained, and stated that the people of England had no idea how many of the valuable lives of our soldiers were lost in every petty skirmish, and declared his belief that if the colonists and the Maories were left to fight it out, so well had the colonists supplied the latter with arms, that probably the Natives would have the best of it. If the right hon. Gentleman wished to be distinguished as the wisest Minister who ever presided at the Colonial Office, he would by the next mail send out orders to make peace as soon as possible, to wash our hands of an unrighteous and iniquitous war, and leave the colonists to reap the fruit of their own misdeeds.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that if when the Estimates were passed the Government had foreseen the unfortunate turn which events in New Zealand had subsequently taken, they would not have proposed reduction in any of the votes. At the same time he saw no reason for introducing a supplemental Estimate at the present moment. If the Estimate was exceeded there would be ample time before the close of the financial year to adopt that measure. It, unfortunately, seemed probable that hostilities might continue for some time longer; but, looking at the war from a financial point of view, hon. Members must recollect that the chief source of expense was the cost of transporting commissariat supplies and stores for a large army in the field in the interior of the country. General Cameron had, however, now removed the greater part of his forces from the interior, leaving only a sufficient number of troops to hold the posts from which he had driven the Natives, and had transported them by sea to the eastern shore of the Island, where the operations were likely to be less expensive than those carried on in the interior. Besides this, the Commissariat had, according to the last advices, made arrangements for supplying the troops left in the interior by means of water carriage, which would be much cheaper than the land transport which they had hitherto had to employ. The House would gain no information from any supplemental Estimate which could now be laid upon the table, founded, as it must be, upon no certain data, and he still hoped that the Estimate already presented would not be materially exceeded.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that he had received a letter from that distinguished naval officer Sir William Wiseman, commanding on the New Zealand station, in which he described the excellent service rendered by the naval brigade at Tauranga, where he himself directed the operations, and detailed the particulars of the gallant and noble deaths of Captain Hamilton of the Esk and Commander Hay of the Harrier, and other officers. From the conclusion of his letter he gathered that he was of opinion that the war might be indefinitely prolonged, and that it was totally unjustifiable.

The House divided:—Ayes 79; Noes 32: Majority 47.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1 (Sums borrowed under recited Act of General Assembly of New Zealand, not exceeding £1,000,000 and Interest, guaranteed under this Act).

MR. MORRISON moved by way of Amendment the substitution of the words "five hundred thousand pounds" for "one million pounds," observing that the proposed guarantee was an Imperial guarantee and ought to be rendered applicable only to Imperial purposes. He did not at all, he said, mean to doubt that the colony would make good the £1,000,000 which it was sought by the Bill to guarantee; he objected to the proposal on principle, and thought it ought not to go beyond the £500,000 in which the colony was indebted to this country. He was also, he might add, opposed to our soldiers being sacrificed in wresting their land from the Native population of New Zealand, his belief being that the colonists were in all likelihood led to persevere in that policy by the fact that their imaginations were fired by the idea that large quantities of gold were to be found in the northern part of the Native territory. We were thus led to throw away many valuable lives in the pursuit of an object not in the least of Imperial importance, and he for one objected to our guaranteeing money for that purpose.

MR. CARDWELL said, that in the despatch he had sent to Sir George Grey he had distinctly stated that no portion of the guaranteed loan was to be applied to the purposes of a military settlement.

MR. WALPOLE regarded the war as being most unjust, and he hoped that as soon as it was ended an entirely new policy with reference to New Zealand would be initiated, but it was another question what should be done in the present crisis. Our policy had been quite sufficient to provoke the inhabitants of the colony to the acts which they had committed, but we could not conduct ourselves towards a colony when in a crisis in the same manner as we would deal with that colony at the conclusion of the war.

SIR MORTON PETO said, that having engaged in an unjust quarrel, the only course left for us to pursue was to end it as soon as possible. The proper course would be to allow the colony to obtain their loan without the guarantee at an interest of 6 or 7 per cent. Such a course would practically put an end to the war at once; but if they entered on the course of guaranteeing loans the war would never come to an end.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY thought it had been shown that the security would not be sufficient for the loan of a million, and he should support the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. Morrison), as he thought it might be good enough for the loan of half that amount.

MR. WHITE wished to know, whether the colonists intended raising a further sum of £2,000,000 upon the security of colonial debentures, and whether they proposed applying it to their grand scheme of colonization?

MR. CARDWELL said, that the £2,000,000 had nothing to do with the present loan, which would have a prior claim upon the revenue.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS would not vote for the Amendment, for he objected altogether to the principle of a guarantee.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE could not sit still and hear the war stigmatized as being unjust. Had the Government concurred in that view, orders would have been issued long since to put an end to it upon any terms. He maintained that any one who would carefully examine the subject could not fail to come to the conclusion that the war was a just and necessary one. The Governor (Sir George Grey) had used every effort to prevent a most warlike, turbulent, and misguided portion of the Natives from renewing hostilities with their neighbours, but had unfortunately failed; and he had been forced by the perversity and unjust and extravagant suspicions of the Natives into a war which was strictly a war of self-defence.

COLONEL SYKES wished to know, if the war had not originated in the objection which some chiefs entertained against the sale of some land by another chief, which they said he had no right to sell without their consent?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the hon. and gallant Member referred to the former and not to the present war. The Governor in that instance not unjustly refused to submit to the dictation of a Native chief who had usurped the prerogative of the Crown.

MR. AYRTON thought the Under Secretary of the Colonies was mistaken as to the origin of the war. Governor Browne had stated that the colonists were determined to get possession of the land of the Natives, rightly if they could, if not by any other mode.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Treasury not to approve of the borrowing of £1,000,000 until certain provision is made).

MR. AYRTON asked, whether the arrangement that this country was to pay half the expenses of the war was to be permanent?

MR. CARDWELL said, that in the Correspondence it was stated distinctly that the arrangement was subject to revision hereafter.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

NAVY & ARMY EXPENDITURE (1862-3).

COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that as the proceeding which he was about to ask the Committee to take was a novel one, he felt it his duty to say a few words to explain the object of the Resolutions which he had just handed to the Speaker. Up to last year the Reports of the Army and Navy expenditure were laid upon the table soon after the meeting of Parliament, and they passed, so to speak, sub silentio; but the Committee on Public Accounts had recommended that those Reports should not only be laid on the table, but should be subjected to a confirmatory Vote of the House. The only question was as to the form in which that Vote should be taken, and the same Committee had recommended the pleasure of Parliament should be taken this year in the form which he now proposed. The advances on certain Votes for the Navy were more than covered by the surplus on other Votes; and he was about to ask the Committee to confirm a decision at which the Treasury had arrived, appropriating the surplus on certain Votes of last year to the payment of the advances on certain other Votes of last year.

Mr. Chichester Fortescue

MR. LYGON asked whether the Committee was to understand that the further action was to relieve the Commissioners of Audit or the Treasury, or any other body, from any responsibility?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Appropriation Act as framed last year in conformity with the recommendation of the Committee on Public Accounts gave the Treasury to do only provisionally what before last Session it had done as a final act. Up to last year the Treasury had power to sanction the application by the Admiralty of any surplus on Votes passed by that House to meet advances on other Votes, and the effect of that arrangement was to pass the money without the transaction being submitted to the further and final approval of the House, though the transfer was brought under the notice of the House, inasmuch as the correspondence between the Departments was printed; but no Vote of the House was asked which would have enabled hon. Members to agree to dissent from the transfer. Under the new arrangement the appropriation was merely a provisional transaction, to be completed only when it was sanctioned by the subsequent Vote of the House. The main question which had arisen was whether the matter should be brought under the notice of the House by a simple Resolution or by a revoting of the money. This Resolution had nothing to do with the payment of money. The transaction was complete, and all that was wanted was the authority of Parliament. The effect of asking the House to pass this Resolution was simply to give them the opportunity, if they thought fit, of disapproving of any of these transfers from one Vote to another.

MR. CORRY asked what would be the result if the House refused its sanction to these transfers?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the reply to this question must be very much like Speaker Onslow's reply when asked what would be the consequence of his naming a Member? This was a class of transactions which followed the same principle as Votes for Civil Contingencies. It was necessary to intrust the Government with certain discretionary powers of spending money, and if these powers were misused, a Vote of Censure might be moved.

MR. WALPOLE said, the effect of the change had been to give to this House a control which they did not possess before.

Even the Treasury had heretofore no control over the different Departments, which could supply a deficiency in one Vote out of the surplus upon another without check. By the new regulations, however, not a shilling could be so transferred without the sanction of the Treasury. This was a provisional arrangement, and if the House did not approve it they might pass a Vote of Censure.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER thought that the better arrangement would be to repay into the Exchequer the surplus upon any Vote, and then let Parliament revote it next Session.

Resolutions agreed to.

(1.) Resolved,

That the Expenditure incurred for certain Navy Services in the year ended the 31st day of March, 1863, has fallen short of the sums appropriated to those Services by the sum of £870,100; and that the Expenditure which has been incurred for certain other Navy Services and not provided for in the sums appropriated to those Services for the same year has amounted to the sum of £499,702 7s. 9d.

(2.) Resolved,

That the said Expenditure for Navy Services unprovided for as aforesaid, amounting to £499,702 7s. 9d., has been temporarily defrayed, under the authority of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, out of the Surpluses which have arisen, as aforesaid, upon other Votes for Navy Services, amounting to £870,100.

(3.) Resolved,

That the application of so much of the said Surpluses be sanctioned.

(4.) Resolved,

That the Expenditure incurred for certain Army Services in the year ended the 31st day of March, 1863, has fallen short of the sums appropriated to those Services by the sum of £1,097,725 12s., and that the Expenditure which has been incurred for certain other Army Services and not provided for in the sums appropriated to those Services for the same year, has amounted to the sum of £336,309 15s. 8d.

(5.) Resolved,

That the said Expenditure for Army Services unprovided for, as aforesaid, amounting to £336,309 15s. 8d., has been temporarily defrayed, under the authority of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, out of the Surpluses which have arisen, as aforesaid, upon other Votes for Army Services, amounting to £1,097,725 12s.

(6.) Resolved,

That the application of so much of the said Surpluses be sanctioned.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Power to the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works to make Bye-laws and Orders).

SIR JOHN SHELLEY asked whether the tramway in the centre would be removed to the side next the curb, and whether the flanges would also be removed?

MR. COWPER stated that if there was no engineering difficulty he should give instructions for the removal of the tramway as suggested. His desire was that the flanges should continue, but in another place.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY understood from Mr. Page that there would be no difficulty in removing the tramway.

Clause agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS (MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS)—[ADVANCES.]

COMMITTEE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved a Resolution, authorizing the advance from the Consolidated Fund of a sum not exceeding £350,000 on the security of local rates, to be applied to the same purposes as those specified in the Act of last year.

LORD EDWARD HOWARD thanked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for making this proposition, for the distress in the manufacturing districts had by no means passed away.

Resolved,

That the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury be authorized to make further Advances out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to an amount not exceeding £350,000, upon security of Local Rates, for facilitating the execution of Works in certain Manufacturing Districts.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow at Twelve of the clock.

SCOTTISH EPISCOPAL CLERGY DIS-ABILITIES REMOVAL BILL—[BILL 161.]

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE proposed the addition of the following words to the end of the Bill, "or in Ireland, in any Court of Common Law, in the name of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners."

MR. WHALLEY wished to know whether the Bill affected the Act of Settlement. It would enable any one single Bishop to inundate this country with clergymen of the Scotch Episcopal Church, who indulged to a considerable extent in the doctrine of Transubstantiation.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that no Scotch clergyman would be admitted to a living or curacy in England under this Bill without taking the declaration required of English clergymen on ordination.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^o, on Thursday.

PRIVATE BILL COSTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SCOURFIELD, Bill for awarding Costs in certain cases to opponents and promoters of Private Bills, *ordered to be brought in by Mr. SCOURFIELD and Mr. MASSEY.

Bill presented, and read 1^o.* [Bill 221.]

POOR REMOVAL BILL.

On Motion of Mr. VILLIERS, Bill to explain the Statute of Her present Majesty for amending the Laws relating to the removal of the Poor, *ordered to be brought in by Mr. VILLIERS and Mr. GILPIN.

Bill presented, and read 1^o.* [Bill 222.]

SLAVE TRADE IN THE PACIFIC.

PETITION FROM NEW SOUTH WALES.

LORD BROUGHAM presented a Petition from inhabitants of Sydney, New South Wales, in public meeting assembled, praying for measures to suppress the Slave Trade amongst the Islands of the Pacific. The petitioners expressed great indignation at finding a slave trade established in that part of the world by vessels frequenting the neighbouring islands, and inveigling on board or carrying off by main force several hundreds of the poor natives. One vessel had got 700 of the natives on board, and the master complained that he was not allowed to complete his cargo to the full amount by decoying on board or seizing 400 more. So that 1,100 human beings were to be put on board a vessel not capable of holding half the number. The Petitioners prayed that some remedy might be devised for that state of things.

Petition to lie on the table.

NAVAL DISCIPLINE BILL—(No. 205.)

SECOND READING.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that a few Amendments had been found necessary in this Act. Instead, however, of bringing in a separate Bill, he proposed to reproduce the whole Act, and to move certain amended clauses in Committee.

After a short conversation,

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [July 18] reported.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to know, whether the Vote for £2,000 for the Ashantee war was merely an estimate, or represented money already expended? He also wished to know in what position the Government stood with regard to the general expenses of the Ashantee war, and more particularly the power lodged in the hands of Governor Pine, of meeting his necessities by a recourse to the Treasury chest. He thought that some more stringent Resolutions ought to be passed to prevent Colonial Governors from resorting to the Treasury chest without the previous sanction of the Government at home.

MR. PEEL said, that in the absence of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and also of the Under Secretary, it was difficult to give the hon. Baronet the information for which he asked. His (Mr. Peel's) recollection of the particular item was, that it was an expenditure which had already been incurred. Money was advanced out of the Treasury chest during the last year which had been repaid from the Vote. That had necessarily caused an excess on the Vote, which had now to be made good. The Governors of colonies were not permitted, except in extreme cases, to pay advances out of the Treasury chest. In emergencies, however, they had authority under the standing regulations to obtain that money.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he believed the result of such a regulation would be that Colonial Governors could avail themselves of the aid which they could obtain from the Treasury chest whenever they pleased without this country knowing anything of it for two years.

Resolutions agreed to.

[BILL 213.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (The Secretary of State for India in Council empowered to make Regulations for the Medical Service of Her Majesty's Forces in India, and to empower the Authorities in India to make similar Regulations).

MR. HENNESSY said, he thought that a certain number of appointments should be given as the result of competitive examinations. He did not wish to oppose the Bill in a factious spirit, but he should feel himself compelled to oppose it unless the right hon. Baronet would consent to give some assurance that the competitive system would not be entirely abandoned.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had no wish to abolish the competitive examinations, but he desired to extend to the medical service in India the same advantages as those enjoyed by the Queen's service, and the proposal of the Bill was that any assistant-surgeon in the Queen's army—all of whom had obtained their appointments by competition—might, if he so pleased, volunteer into the Indian army.

COLONEL NORTH said, that the deficiency of medical officers in the army was so great that acting assistant-surgeons had lately been introduced—a class of medical officers never before heard of.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he thought that the competitive system could only have failed from the standard of examination being too high, or the pay too low, and the Bill did not do anything to effect improvements in either of these directions.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the position of the officers had been bettered both as to rank and pay.

COLONEL SYKES complained that many of the Natives of India who were in every respect well qualified for the posts were prevented from entering the service from the prejudice which existed against the colour of their skins.

MR. HENNESSY said, he regarded the Bill as substituting the old system of patronage for the competitive examination, which had been found to work so admirably, and he should therefore move that the House report Progress.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he did not see how the difficulty in filling up the vacancies in the Queen's army would be remedied by allowing officers to volunteer into the Indian service.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he would consent to insert a proviso in the Bill enacting that all the regulations referring to the appointment of medical officers should be submitted to Parliament.

MR. COLLINS said, he thought that no action should be taken upon the regulations until they had been before the House one month.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he could not agree to the proposition of the hon.

Mr. Hennessy

Member. The regulations should be submitted to the House after they had come into operation.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Hennessy.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 6; Noes 43: Majority 37.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he proposed to submit the regulations to Parliament within fourteen days after they were made, provided Parliament were sitting, and if not, within fourteen days after the next meeting of Parliament.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That all such regulations shall be laid before Parliament within fourteen days after the meeting thereof, if Parliament be sitting, and if Parliament be not sitting, then within fourteen days after the next meeting thereof."—(Sir Charles Wood.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. HENNESSY moved as an Amendment the insertion of words suspending the operation of the regulations until they had been a fortnight before the House.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the word "all," and insert the word "no,"—(Mr. Hennessy.)—instead thereof.

Question put, "That the word 'all' stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 7: Majority 17.

And it appearing that 40 Members were not present, the Chairman left the Chair.

MR. SPEAKER resumed the Chair.

House counted, and 40 Members being present,

Bill further considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Question again put, "That the word 'all' stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 11: Majority 23.

MR. HENNESSY complained that the majority of those who had heard the discussion had voted with him, but that his Amendment had been lost in consequence of a number of hon. Members having come down from the Committee-rooms. The Bill was passed at one o'clock that morning, and was now hurried through Committee. It proposed entirely to abolish competitive examination, and, knowing how many of his young countrymen obtained the appointments under the present system, he believed he was only doing his duty in resisting it to the utmost.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he would stand by his Motion.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 6: Majority 24.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

COMPLAINTS OF THE CUSTOMS OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

MR. C. TURNER said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take into consideration the various Petitions presented to this House by the Customs Employés, with a view to the removal of the grievances complained of by assimilating the pay and classification of the Customs to the pay and classification of the Inland Revenue and other similar Departments of the Public Service?

MR. PEEL replied that there was no standard of pay and classification in the Public Service which could be applied to all offices indiscriminately without reference to the nature and the responsibility of the duties to be performed. The practice was to grant to each office a number of clerks and rates of pay, which were considered adequate to obtain an efficient body of servants. He thought it far better that such office should have the salaries of the clerks it required fixed with reference to its own particular requirements rather than with reference to the practice adopted in any other public Department. During the last year the officers of the Customs had memorialised the Treasury for an improvement in their condition; and while in some cases the Lords of the Treasury had not seen their way to comply with the application, in other cases they had not only added to the emoluments of the officers but accelerated their promotion, and he hoped very considerably ameliorated their position.

THE YORKSHIRE RESERVOIRS.

QUESTION.

MR. FERRAND said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he did not communicate with the Mayor of Bradford, two years ago, on the dangerous state of the Doe Park Reservoir, who replied that it had been emptied, and should not be again filled until the embankment was secure; whether Mr. Rawlinson, the Government Inspector, has not reported to the Home Office that "this Reservoir has been full and overflowing several times; on some occasions it has been full, or nearly full, for several successive weeks; and there is a dangerous leak beneath the main embankment, and that the Reservoir is in a dangerous state;" whether he has not also reported that "the bye-wash space should be increased at the several Bradford Reservoirs, and that such floods as occurred in July, 1855, ought to be guarded against in future;" and whether, after this Government Report, and the danger to which hundreds of persons have been exposed by the non-fulfilled pledge of the Mayor of Bradford, it is not the official duty of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to exercise his authority to protect them from danger in future; and whether he will not incur grave responsibility if he fails to do so?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, he had communicated with the Mayor of Bradford in March, 1862, with reference to the Doe Park Reservoir, who informed him that the water was let off, and that the Waterworks Committee proposed to examine the reservoir on the next day, accompanied by their engineer; and that every precaution would be taken to secure the safety of the public. He afterwards received the Report of the engineer, who stated the instructions he had given to the contractor as to some alterations, which he trusted would prove entirely effective. The engineer did not say that the reservoir would not again be filled till the embankment was secure, but it was obvious that it could not be so filled until the alterations in progress were completed. No further complaint of this reservoir was made until March in the present year, when Mr. Rawlinson was directed to inspect it. His Report was on the table of the House and could be referred to by any hon. Member. A copy was sent to the Mayor of Bradford. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ferrand) was mistaken in supposing that the Secretary of State had any official authority to insure the safety of reservoirs. He could only, as in this case, call the attention of the persons under whose charge they were to any alleged defects in their construction, and on those persons alone rested the responsibility of making them secure. At the time of Mr. Rawlinson's inspection of the Doe Park Reservoir it was empty. He reported that both at Doe Park and Barden there was a leakage, that the work of repair would be heavy in both instances, but that he was assured that it should be complete. With those exceptions he reported that the Bradford Reservoirs and works had been well devised, and appeared to be well executed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked, Whether the right hon. Gentleman did not think it would be desirable to appoint a Commission, composed of engineers, to inquire into the best mode of constructing reservoirs in future?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had not lost sight of the suggestions which had been made on the subject; but the Government had not come to any decision with respect to it.

MR. ARNOLD AND THE POLICE.

QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Police Constable 244 B, as to whom Mr. Arnold, the Magistrate at Westminster Police Court, publicly stated on two several occasions in the month of May last, that he would not believe him on his oath, was still continued in the Force?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that that police constable was still in the force, and that he thought it would be a gross injustice to dismiss him. No reason had been assigned by Mr. Arnold for the opinion he was said to have expressed, and he (Sir George Grey) could see no good ground for that opinion.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to know, Whether any further inquiry was to be made in regard to Mr. Arnold?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he did not think there was any ground for inquiry. He had notified to Mr. Arnold that if he or any other magistrate desired to bring any misconduct on the part of a constable under the notice of the Commissioners, he should enter it in the charge-sheet expressly provided for the purpose.

Sir George Grey

DENMARK AND GERMANY—THE PRUSSIANS AND THE NORWEGIAN MAIL STEAMER "VIKEN."—QUESTION.

MR. WYLD said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If Her Majesty's Government have received any information of an attack made by the Prussian troops upon the Norwegian Royal Mail steamer Viken (sailing from Christiania to Lubeck) whilst landing passengers at Frederickshaven in Jutland on the morning of the 13th of July, on which occasion the lives of some British subjects who were on board were seriously endangered?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that the Government had received information that some Prussian troops had fired upon this mail steamer; but he had not heard that there were any English passengers on board, or that she was landing any passengers. The fact appeared to be that the Prussian troops had mistaken the vessel, and thought she was a Danish vessel carrying troops. But the Swedish Minister had addressed a Note to the Prussian Government on the subject, and they had promised that an inquiry should be made into the case.

MR. WYLD said, it was quite a mistake to suppose there were no English passengers on board the steamer. There were several English passengers, and one of them was nearly wounded by a bullet which was fired from the Prussian vessel.

CANADA—THE NORTH AMERICAN COLONIES.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN WALSH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will have any objection to lay upon the table of the House the Despatches recently received from the Governor General of Canada, and the other Governors of our North American Colonies, relative to the recent Ministerial Changes and the project of a Federal Union of those Colonies; and whether it is his intention, before the close of the Session, to make any statement, or to afford any information to the House on the important legislative crisis which appears to be impending in the constitution of those Colonies?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that a new Government having been formed in Canada by a union between the two parties into which the Assembly was divided, the intention of the new Government to mature, during the recess, measures for an important purpose, namely, for settling the constitutional difficulties which had prevailed in the Upper and Lower Provinces, by what they called the federative principle, applied to Canada itself, with a provision for the future reception into the Union of the maritime provinces of the North Western territory. He understood it was their intention, after maturing those measures, to communicate with the Home Government on the subject; but as those measures had not yet been framed, it was manifestly not in his (Mr. Cardwell's) power to give any information on the subject.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that, in the month of April last, a lunatic named Alexander Eiffe, committed on the usual certificates to the public and private Lunatic Asylum of Lucan, county of Dublin, was forcibly removed by two bailiffs from thence for debt to Kilmainham Gaol, which caused his death within six weeks after his arrest; and whether he will consult with the Law Officers of the Crown as to the desirability of having such a change made in the Law as would prevent, under similar circumstances, a person from being removed from a Lunatic Asylum to a prison?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, in reply, that as the Lucan Asylum was a private establishment, the Government could not interfere under the circumstances. He would, however, consult with the Law Officers of the Crown, as to whether any steps could be taken on the subject in regard to the future.

FORTS ON THE GOLD COAST.

QUESTION.

MR. C. P. BERKELEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If any account can be given of the sum of £4,000, which has been annually voted for fifty years for the repairs and maintenance of Forts and Establishments on the Gold Coast, which Forts are now reported by Commodore Wilmot to be in a "dilapidated condition, and to require great repairs," very little attention seeming to have been paid to them for years past?

MR. CARDWELL replied, that the £4,000, which had long been contributed for the purpose stated, had been carried to the receipt side of the financial accounts of the Gold Coast, and formed part of the general revenue of the settlement.

TROOPS FOR JAPAN.

QUESTION.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he rose to ask the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the case that a regiment has been ordered from Hong Kong to Japan on the requisition of Sir Rutherford Alcock; and, if so, whether he can explain for what purpose these troops are required?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, a despatch had been received from General Brown at Hong Kong, stating that a requisition had arrived from Sir Rutherford Alcock for the remaining companies of the 2nd battalion of the 20th regiment, then stationed at Hong Kong, to be sent to him at Yokohama. General Brown said that the requisition would be complied with as soon as transports could be obtained.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he wished to know whether there is any statement in the despatch as to the object for which the troops are required in Japan?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that Sir Rutherford Alcock spoke only in general terms of the state of affairs at present existing in Japan.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Six companies.

LORD NAAS said, he would beg to give notice that on the Motion for Adjournment next Friday, he would call the attention of the House to this expedition to Japan, and ask the Government what is the precise object in view?

MR. COBDEN said, he did not understand how many men were to be sent to Yokohama.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he could not speak exactly as to the number of men, but he believed that there were two companies already at Yokohama, and the remainder of the troops would be six companies, or probably about 800 men.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, whether it is true that a considerable force of marines was also under orders for Japan?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he was not then in a position to answer the question. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would repeat it on Thursday.

CONVENT SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has re-considered the statement he made the other night, that there was a convent school in the King's County which had been reported on unfavourably?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that since the hon. Gentleman's question had been last put to him he had looked more carefully into the matter, and had found that the school of which the Inspector had reported unfavourably was situated, not in the county which the hon. Gentleman represented, but in the Queen's County.

PAPER MANUFACTURE.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. MAGUIRE* rose to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the position of the paper manufacture of Great Britain and Ireland with respect to foreign taxation. A great and grievous wrong had, he said, been done by the Government and Parliament to an important branch of British industry, and that industry now appealed through him to the Government and to Parliament for consideration, and, if possible, for redress. The importance of the interest which he represented might be indicated by a few facts and figures. The capital embarked in the paper trade was no less than £7,000,000; it employed directly or indirectly about 100,000 persons, and at least 200,000 persons were, through the workmen and their families, dependent on its continuance and prosperity. If he judged of the wages by the annual production of the trade, he found that from £1,000,000 to £1,500,000 was diffused throughout the rural districts of the country in wages to operatives. Such, then, was the trade which had been sacrificed, not to free trade, but to the mere claptrap-cry of free trade, and, indeed, to what seemed to be rather exceptional and aggressive protection than to real free trade. In the year

The Marquess of Hartington

1860, or previous to the Government proposal of that year, paper was liable to two duties, the Excise duty and the Customs duty. Threeshillpence in the pound represented the Excise duty, and 1*d.* the Customs duty. The Customs duty was a duty wisely imposed, not as a protection to the British trader, but as an equivalent for the tax imposed by foreigners on rags imported into this country from foreign countries. That duty was revised in 1853, when the present Chancellor of the Exchequer held the office which he now filled; and Mr. Wilson, one of the most determined free traders that ever held office under any free trade Government, considered that 1*d.* in the pound was only a fair equivalent for the rag duty. Hon. Members who knew anything of the paper trade knew that rags were an essential necessity to the paper manufacturer. In fact, good paper could not be manufactured without rags. Paper could be made from various fibres and other articles, but, to use the words of Mr. Wrigley, "Rags will always be the sheet-anchor of the paper manufacturer." They were the raw material which the manufacturers could most readily obtain, and so long as they continued to be used, so long would a certain quantity or proportion of that material be introduced from other countries to supply the wants of the British paper manufacturers. It took a ton and a half of rags of the best quality to make a ton of fine paper, and it required two tons of the lowest description of rags to make a ton of an inferior class of paper. Therefore, when a duty of £5, £6, or even £9 was imposed on a ton of rags, such a duty must have a considerable effect upon a ton of paper. If a foreigner was able to buy his rags from £5 to £9 a ton lower than the British manufacturer, he must always have an advantage over the British manufacturer which no amount of skill, energy, or capital could overcome. The anticipations of the trade with regard to the disastrous effect of the policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by which they were recklessly exposed to this unfair competition, had been more than fully realized. The rag duty levied at the present moment on the export of rags in Russia was £6 5*s.* a ton; in Sweden the exportation was free; in Prussia and all through the Zollverein the duty was £9 3*s.*; in Holland, £4 18*s.*; in Austria, £7 5*s.*; in Italy, £3 5*s.*, although formerly only £1 12*s.* 8*d.* In France, where the exportation was formerly prohibited, the duty was now £5 per ton; in Belgium, £5; and in Portugal, £6. Therefore, he was quite correct in saying that the rag duty now ranged from £4 to £9, and upon a ton of paper it necessarily operated as a duty ranging from £6 to £14. In 1860 the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to abolish the Excise duty on paper. He (Mr. Maguire) went with the right hon. Gentleman in that proposal. The only question to be considered at that time was one of revenue—whether it was wise, under the circumstances, to take so much from the taxes or revenue of the country as the right hon. Gentleman proposed to take? It was generally admitted that the question resolved itself into that one narrow point; indeed, the House had on two previous occasions passed a Resolution in favour of the abolition of the duty. He (Mr. Maguire) supported the right hon. Gentleman, because he considered his proposal to be a wise one, and that it would be not only beneficial to the manufacturer but advantageous to the consumer. Circumstances which had occurred since then proved that there had been no loss to the revenue which had not been more than made up by the expanding industry of the country, and it was also proved that the consumer had had the full advantage of the reduction. If the right hon. Gentleman had been wise at that time, there was not one of his prophecies which might not have been realized. But the right hon. Gentleman, by dealing as he did with the question of the Customs duty as against the foreign rag tax, prevented the prophecies he had made from being realized; and so far from doing a benefit to the trade, he inflicted upon it—no doubt unconsciously and in ignorance—one of the greatest evils which was ever inflicted by a British minister upon any branch of native industry. The right hon. Gentleman made an eloquent speech on the occasion of his proposing the abolition of the Excise duty, in the course of which he said that one of the advantages would be that “We should not merely stimulate the process of massing people in the great centres of industry, but should create a demand for labour all over the country. Where there are streams, villages, pure air, and tolerable access, there are the places where the paper manufacture tends to establish itself. I want to see, and I do not despair of seeing, these village mills spring up again and flourish.”

The right hon. Gentleman at that time expressed the greatest sympathy for the smaller class of millowners, for he complained that the trade was gradually being absorbed into the hands of those who were possessed of large capital. It was for the House to say whether the anticipations of the right hon. Gentleman had been realized. When the right hon. Gentleman made that speech, and when it became known afterwards that he was going to abolish the Customs duty, and to leave the British manufacturers at the mercy of foreigners who taxed British manufactures for the benefit of their own people, great alarm was felt in the trade. From that moment the lobby became crowded with persons interested in the trade, whose interests were endangered by the policy of the right hon. Gentleman. They said that they were no enemies to free trade, and he (Mr. Maguire) asserted that they were not. They asked for nothing that would be a violation of the principles of free trade. Without going to Mr. M'Culloch or Mr. Mill, or any of those great authorities, he would simply appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden), who might be called the father of free trade in that House, and who in speaking upon the question of the malt tax used these words—

“I am bound to say that we have never lost sight of the producer in the great changes of the last twenty years. We know Sir Robert Peel held that before we exposed the manufacturers of this country to competition with other nations, we should relieve them from every disadvantage with respect to the articles they require for their raw materials.”

That was the very principle which the paper manufacturers declared to have been violated in their case. There was this foreign tax imposed upon their raw material, which tax was adverse to their interests, and in favour of the foreign manufacturer, and yet the right hon. Gentleman deliberately did away with the equivalent, which was not a protection, but a compensation for the injury which Foreign Governments inflicted upon British industry. Probably the hon. Member for Rochdale would favour the House with his opinion upon the subject later in the debate, and would be able to say whether the policy of the right hon. Gentleman was not a direct violation of all that he had declared to be necessary. When the right hon. Gentleman addressed himself to the Customs question on the 6th of August, 1860, and also previously to that date, promises were held out, as perhaps they would be held out that night to the paper makers, that the rag duty was to be abolished.

Lord John Russell said in that House that, according to his reading of the treaty, there would be no further duty on rags, and the paper manufacturers were told by their friends, who went out into the lobby to see them, and to bring them the welcome intelligence, "Now you may go home; you are all right." The right hon. Gentleman also held out the same promise of redress. The paper makers endeavoured to impress on Members of that House, without distinction of party, that their case was a hard one, that they were treated exceptionally, and that if the country derived benefit from the French Treaty, they at least would be injured. Now, he charged the right hon. Gentleman with not having availed himself of the offer of the French Government, and not maintaining, even for one year longer, the Customs duty, which would have been the means of compelling Foreign Governments to do away with the obnoxious rag tax. In his speech on the 6th of August, 1860, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

"The French Government have made known to us that they will not, if it is our desire, press upon us the immediate fulfilment of the stipulation in regard to paper."—[3 Hansard, clx. 709.]

But the Chancellor was apprehensive the "paper makers would suffer if this were delayed," and he added—

"It is true humanity to let a man loose from being the victim of his own groundless alarms."—[Ibid. 711.]

The right hon. Gentleman said he was so confident in the energy, skill, and industry of the British trader that he would not accept the offer of the Emperor of the French. He scoffed at what he called the exaggerated fears and dismal forebodings of the paper makers, and said it was true humanity and the most merciful relief to free men from their mere fanciful chimeras. Statements were then made on the part of the trade in order to show the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the withdrawal of the Customs duty and the flooding of the British market with paper that was artificially cheapened, while paper manufactured here was made artificially dear, would be attended with fatal consequences. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would not believe the trade. At length, in 1861, the pressure was put so strongly on the right hon. Gentleman, that he yielded a Committee, which sat on the 2nd of July, and reported to the House on the 25th of the same month. That Committee reported to the following effect: they said—

Mr. Maguire

"That, under the circumstances under which the British manufacturer was placed, the most disastrous consequences would ensue, unless some steps were speedily taken to place him on terms of fair competition with those of the Continent. That the removal of the Excise duty will not place the English manufacturer in a position of equity with his Continental rivals so long as the export duties on rags remain in force. That the Committee therefore recommend that the British Government should continue strenuous exertions to effect the removal of all restrictions upon the exports of all paper makers' materials."

That was the recommendation of the Committee of that House, and up to this moment nothing had been done; or, if the Government had made any real efforts, no practical result had followed. The anticipations which were expressed in the strongest possible manner before that Committee, and which were also then supported by facts, had been realized up to this time to a most deplorable extent. The right hon. Gentleman made a speech in the present year, and in the course of that speech he referred to the paper trade, and to their alleged sufferings and fancied grievances. His conscience evidently was not easy; he felt that he had done a grievous wrong to a particular branch of industry; and so nervous was he about the matter, that although there was no actual necessity for introducing the question of the paper duty in his financial statement this year, the right hon. Gentleman referred on that occasion at great length to the paper trade. The right hon. Gentleman had, he believed, two letters in his pocket at that time. One of them was from a British paper maker, showing him, by facts and figures, what the deplorable result of his policy had been. The other was a communication from a gentleman whose statement he quoted to the House, and which excited the most extraordinary wonder among the trade. The right hon. Gentleman impressed upon the House that the paper makers did not understand their business; that they did not know what was good for them; that they were like all other men who had grown up under the enervating shadow of protection; that they were foolishly apprehensive of the struggle and competition of free trade; but that the very moment their energies were braced by a healthier atmosphere they conquered every difficulty, and succeeded in acquiring prosperity and independence. "And now," said the right hon. Gentleman, "to prove my case, I will give one important fact." That "important fact" rested on the authority of a gentleman whom he now knew, and about whom he would tell the House something—a gentleman who really did not understand practically what he was dealing with, and who, carried away by his own ideas of his wonderful discovery, had deluded himself and deceived the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman, on the 7th of April, said—

“His statement is this:—His mill [the mill of this gentleman or the company to which he belonged] is almost a new one. For the four months ending the 31st of October, 1863, he found that he made his paper at a cost of £57 per ton, and that commodity, made at such a cost, did not pay him. He did not complain; he joined in no agitation for the reimposition of the paper duty, or for other purposes, equally unattainable; but he and his partners set themselves to work to see what could be done by improvements in the processes of manufacture and by the more skilful and economical use of chemical agents, so essential in the manufacture of paper. The results, as they have been told me, were surprising indeed. In October, 1863, the firm had produced paper, as I have said, at a cost of £57 per ton; in December they produced at a cost of only £47, and at the present moment they were producing at a cost of £39 per ton; and this gentleman declares to me that the article now produced is better than what he produced last summer for £57 per ton. For my own part I cannot say I believe that the condition of the paper trade essentially depends upon the laws of foreign countries with regard to the export of rags. Those laws, no doubt, form an element, and no unimportant element, in the case of the paper makers, but I am convinced they would be ill-advised if they were taught to depend upon anything but their own energies.”—[3 Hansard, clxiv. 554-5.]

[The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman cheered. Now he held in his hand an advertisement inserted in “Mr. Marsh’s periodical sale, Thursday, the 5th of May, 1864.” The right hon. Gentleman, it should be remembered, told the paper makers that in order to realize immediate fortunes, all they had to do was to follow the example of that wonderful discoverer. Well, if that gentleman had gone on as he said he had been doing, what would have been the result? Why, the shares of his company would have sold for 200 per cent premium; but what was the fact? They had been sold at 60 per cent discount. The glowing statement was made by the right hon. Gentleman on the 7th of April, and on the 5th of May the shares in that company were sold at over 60 per cent discount by public auction; and, more than that, they were not bought by the public, but by a member of the company. He held in his hand the prospectus of the company; but he did not think it necessary to mention names, either in the present case or in any other. However, he might say that the gentleman in question was known to some hon. Members. The prospectus stated that the object of the company was to take advantage of the repeal of the Excise duty on paper under circumstances that were peculiarly favourable. The capital of the company was £150,000, the whole of which, except £15,000 held in reserve, was paid up; thus £9 out of every £10 share had been called and paid. He had in his hand a copy of a note of the sale of fifteen shares in that company. The fifteen shares, at £9 each, had cost £135, and at the sale they fetched only £3 15s. each, and produced altogether but £55. What, then, did the House think of the statement paraded there at that table by the right hon. Gentleman, and sent forth throughout the United Kingdom—a statement, the object of which was, to dry up in the breast of every hon. Gentleman any sympathy he might have for an oppressed class of his fellow-subjects? He said that statement was a melancholy delusion; he would not go further than that. Four companies had been started under the auspices of the right hon. Gentleman. One of them was dead, another was in difficulties, a third had its shares sold at 60 per cent discount, and here were the facts relative to another. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman might have access to that document as well as he had. Here was a pretty state of things? A new mill, new energy, ample capital; and what was the result? Disappointment and disaster. This was what the directors stated. He belonged himself to some companies in his own city, and if, as chairman, he had to make such a statement, he should be inclined to leave his city as soon as he possibly could. Thank Heaven, it had never been his lot to read such a Report as that which he was now about to quote. This company was incorporated and started under the auspices of the right hon. Gentleman in March, 1860. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Under my auspices?] Mr. Maguire did not mean to say that the right hon. Gentleman contributed any solid coin to the company; he only meant that the right hon. Gentleman had invested in it in an imaginary—in a Parliamentary sense. The right hon. Gentleman had deluded, bewildered, and disappointed many, many in England, as he should prove, and he was sure the right hon. Gentleman was anxious to know the exact state of one of his pet companies. Here was the Report:—The company was called the East Lancashire Paper Mill Company, and "The Directors in presenting their Report for the half-year ending December 31, 1863, beg to state that, although in reference to the statement of accounts there appears to be a considerable loss in the working of your concern, yet, at the same time, the shareholders must bear in mind the increasing price of materials, without a corresponding increase in the price of paper, and which has necessarily been a cause of the amount of loss during the past half-year."

To commercial men it would appear rather strange that nothing was allowed for depreciation, or for bad debts. Here was the balance sheet: The first half-year there appeared a balance on the wrong side of £301 6s. 3d., and the second half-year there was a balance also on the wrong side of £587 5s. 7½d., making in one year, in consequence of the rag tax—in a case where there was ample capital, new machinery, and every modern improvement—a loss of £888 11s. 10½d. So much for this company. And now, as a matter not of justice to himself, a feeble advocate of a great cause, but to the paper makers of England, he earnestly implored attention to a few extracts from letters written by men smarting under a sense of wrong, and representing the disasters and misery that had overtaken them. He had the original documents in his possession, and would place them, in confidence, at the disposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he desired to verify the statements which he made. There were nearly forty letters in all, but he would only quote a few of them, without, of course, mentioning names, or even the county where the parties carried on their trade, for he did not wish to destroy the credit of men, many of whom were still struggling under desperate difficulties. He would only observe that nearly every county in England and in Scotland was represented in this appeal to the sympathy of the House. The paper trade had no alternative but to make an appeal to the House. [Mr. CORBEN dissented.] He begged the hon. Member for Rochdale to attend to the statements he was about to read, and then he would ask him to defend his policy, if he adhered to the principles of free trade, which he denied he had done in the case of the paper makers. The hon. Member would find that the case was, at least, deserving of his very deepest sympathy. The right hon. Gentleman up to the present moment had denied the facts stated by the trade. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said there was no distress. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No!] The right hon. Gentleman made a statement the other day which could have no other meaning. He said everything depended on themselves—that the foreign rag tax was nothing; all that was required was that they should be industrious and energetic. Did he not talk of imaginary grievances, of dismal pictures of fancied ruin? By every word that came from his lips the right hon. Gentleman had practically denied the existing state of things. Well, then, he asked the House of Commons, when were they to have an inquiry into the operation and result of the Chancellor's fatal policy? The paper trade was told to keep quiet and all would be right. Were they to make no movement till they were crushed to the very earth? Were they to make no demand on the sympathy of the House till forty or fifty of these respectable men were in the Gazette, and thousands of those whom they employed were beggars scattered over the face of the world? When were they to make their appeal if not now? No good had up to the present time resulted from the policy which had been sanctioned by the House; and were not those who suffered from that policy to proclaim their sufferings to the Government and to the country? Here was one statement—

"Besides paper, we were the largest millboard makers in the — of England, but in consequence of the free import of foreign millboards, while the foreign duty was kept on materials, we have been driven completely out of the market, so that this year we have not made a sheet. The foreign boards are much inferior to our make, but our customers say they cannot give our price when they can make the foreign boards answer the purpose at about half the price. To show that we are not alone in this department, we have just had a letter from a firm who made millboards, offering us their whole stock of utensils. Our net profits, after deducting interest on capital employed, were, in 1859, £1,000; capital employed, £17,000. During the next two years—in consequence of Mr. Gladstone's high eulogiums and our own expectations of the future prosperity of the paper trade, to be caused by the extra demand consequent on the abolition of the Excise duty—we could only work part of our own mill, owing to our making considerable alterations and additions in the building and machinery, so that our profits were necessarily smaller. When at full work with our extra new machinery and buildings we had this result: In 1861-2, profits, £40, capital employed, £31,000; 1862-3, loss, £1,375, 8s. 8d. Since then we have tried all in our power, by increasing our turn-out, and running day and night, to lessen our working expenses per ton of paper produced, and we are sorry to state with very little better success. If these are not proofs enough for any man that the foreign treaty is an abominable curse to the trade, we are at a loss to know what could be. If we were put on a free trade level with the foreigners, we should not be the least afraid to meet all the Continent in the market; but under this vile protection to the foreigner we can see nothing at all before us but utter ruin, or to sell our works at any sacrifice, while we have the mortification of knowing that our opponents are getting rich at our expense."

Here was another letter, in which two cases were stated—

"I am very sorry to have to mention that my own mill, which I have had for thirty-nine years, is closed. My reason for closing it is, the utter impossibility of making a profit while foreign paper is allowed to be sent to this country, free of all restrictions, to compete with ours. My mill, which was engaged in the manufacture of printing papers, and upon which I had only just laid out £5,000, has been closed three years, and I have sustained a great loss thereby. I am sorry for the poor people I was compelled to dismiss, for they had very hard work to get occupation, and the tradespeople here suffered through the closing of the mill. You will be sorry to learn that the men at —mill are under notice to leave. The proprietors find it useless to keep on, foreign paper driving them out of the market. I hope that the Government will really do us justice. Three years must surely be a sufficient time to show that the Government measure respecting our trade has totally failed, and that it is exceedingly unjust and impolitic that our property should be sacrificed and many driven to a state of absolute ruin."

Here was another most important statement—

"At the beginning of last year I found trade exceedingly bad, and I determined to stop one of my mills for a time (finding other employment for my principal hands); and during a stoppage of four months I had the mill put into thorough repair, introducing several modern improvements to economize labour, facilitate the process, and generally to cheapen the production, and as a practical man, I am justified in saying these objects were carried out. I then started the mill again, and up to the end of the year—eight months—I made weekly an increased quantity of better paper, and, therefore, cheapened the production; but my eight months' balance showed a loss of £88. In bringing out that result I have carried to capital account all new machinery and improvements that cannot fairly be placed to working expenses. Now, the entire cause of this ruinous state of things is the high price I have to pay for material, and the low price I am compelled to sell my manufacture at. It is my intention to persevere for another year, in the hope that justice will be done us by the Government; if not, I will have no alternative but close the mill and discharge the workpeople. The paper I have made is for the cheap press."

Here was another case—

"This is a brief statement of my case:—In the year 1862 my actual loss was £100; the year ending 1863 it was £130. The current year, I fear, will be much worse than the two preceding ones. . . . I have been a good deal on short time during the last two years for want of orders. My rent is £260 per annum, and as soon as my actual loss amounts to that sum I will be compelled to shut down altogether."

Here is another case—

"Mine is a very small concern, but it has been all that I wanted up to the time of the repeal of the duty; since then I have not been able to live by my trade, and if something is not done at once to put us in a fair position with the makers on the Continent I must give up altogether, as the little capital I had to work with is gone."

In a letter dated June 4, another gentleman said—

"Finding in the practical working of paper making under the removal of the home duty and the continuance of the foreign duty on rags that a most severe loss would attend our continuance of the manufacture, we relinquish the trade, submitting to the loss entailed upon premises and plant rather than carry it on to our ruin."

Another writer says—

"In reply to the inclosed letter, received this morning, I beg to say that I have given up the paper trade for the last twelve months, as the trade was so bad it was not worth my notice."

Again, another—

"I am one that is nearly ruined with what Mr. Cobden calls 'free trade.' I only want free trade, if I knew how to get it. My mill is now standing, and has been so ten days. I cannot make printing paper pay, and in a new mill, too, only four years built, to be ready by the time the duty was taken off; but I expected free trade in rags as well as in paper. I did not expect all on one side. The old mill was paying here five years ago, but the duty on rags cost me £120 per week more than the same material costs the foreigner, and I have to sell paper against him in this market: The kind I make is now 2½d. to 2¾d. per lb. less than when the duty was on, or say a disadvantage to me of ¾d. or 1d. per lb., and rags higher. My last stock-taking showed a loss of nearly £400 in three months, in addition to the rent, interest, and use of £15,000 worth of machinery; and still I am told to work on until it gets right. If something is not done it will work me out of my mill, and all I have been working for for the last eighteen years, and all will be lost in what is called free trade. I only want real free trade, and if I have that I will not complain. If nothing is done in the House to give us fair or free trade, I would be glad to take half the cost of my mill, and to get out of the paper trade."

All these letters, with one exception, were written in the present year. He had another letter, which he would condense into the following facts. The writer had two mills, one of which was entirely idle, and the other, with two machines, only working half time. He was a loser of several thousands of pounds, in consequence of the present state of things, but he was holding on in the delusive hope that something would be done by the Government in the shape of a correcting and mitigating measure. There were in the paper trade enthusiastic free traders, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer relied upon the evidence of such men, when he asserted that Mr. Wrigley, Mr. Evans, and Mr. Bruce, and other princes of paper manufacture, did not really represent the trade—that these gentlemen were only making political capital for themselves. But he fully relied upon the men who gave opinions contrary to the assertions which had been put forth by those Gentlemen to whom he had alluded. He (Mr. Maguire) had evidence from that quarter. He found it stated by a firm of enthusiastic free traders—

“That having no fear of the repeal of the duties, they expended in new works from £20,000 to £30,000 ‘with every newest invention and plant known to the world,’ are ‘woefully disappointed,’ the result being the very opposite of their sanguine anticipations. They now think that ‘Free Trade has its limits.’”

Another firm wrote in somewhat the same spirit. They also had been the victims of the Chancellor's eloquent imaginings.

“They go on to say that ‘yielding to the impulse,’ they laid out £6,000 in extensions and improvements; no result but disappointment, materials dearer, and prices lower.’ Are ‘now fairly at a standstill, not knowing how to live.’”

He could show that this was a question affecting country gentlemen who were owners of mill property, and to prove that he would read a few lines from a letter dated from a London club—

“Although not a paper manufacturer I am a sufferer from having paper-mill property—namely, two mills unlet, entirely from the unsatisfactory state of the trade. They are eligibly situated both as regards situation for carriage and supply of the purest spring water. I had made all preliminary arrangements with a firm of substance for manufacturing fine paper, but on account of the unsatisfactory state of the law respecting rags they declined embarking in the business.”

He would only quote one other English authority, and that was a letter which did credit to the gentleman who wrote it. He could not give the name, but it was one which might be proclaimed upon the housetop with honour to the writer of it. The letter, dated on the previous day, said—

“Without giving names, you are at liberty to state that a (my) paper mill, having therein invested capital to the amount of between £40,000 and £50,000, has for the last twelve months been quite unremunerative—not made one penny of profits—and that the said mills would have been closed in the spring of 1863 had not the proprietors been desirous to prevent some 300 work-people from being thrown out of employment in the midst of a town whose inhabitants were out of work and in distress owing to the then existing cotton famine.”

He would next quote one or two cases from Scotland, a land where energy and industry were known to exist, and where economy and prudence in business was as distinguishing a feature in the national character as was hospitality in social intercourse. One Scotch manufacturer wrote—

“... I am a maker of wrapping papers, and, prior to 1861, was kept in full and regular work at fair prices, leaving me a profit at from 10 to 12½ per cent. Since 1861, though using great personal exertion to keep my trade, I have been necessitated to put my mill on half-time, and can with much difficulty, and at unremunerative prices, keep on even at this reduced make. From various causes our material has got scarce and very dear, while competition from home and from abroad has reduced the value of paper. When in London, three weeks ago, an old customer of mine showed me a paper he was buying from a Dutch mill at £19 a ton free in London. This is a sort I used to make in considerable quantity and to profit, but cannot now touch without serious loss, not mere absence of profit. Yet give me free access to some market for material, and I know I could beat the Dutchman in his paper and price by 50s., and have a fair profit. He, however, has advantage over me of £5 per ton export duty on the material, being, on the 30 to 33 cwt. necessary to produce a ton of paper, some £8. No skill will avail to overcome such a difference.”

This was from one of those self-reliant men who had been spoken of, and he recommended the succeeding words to the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The writer went on to say—

“For myself, I have not called out till I was hurt, and that most severely. I do not ask more than full and fair free trade in the material as well as in the paper produced, and I am content to compete with any; with full confidence I can keep my former customers from continuing to go abroad for cheap paper, while I shall employ more hands, and be more prosperous and contented, which at present I am not.”

Another Scotch manufacturer, who paid a rental of £1,000 a year, said—

“He could not work half-time, or shut for a time, as great loss would be the result. When his loss reaches £2,000 a year he will shut up. On the production of one machine he made some years ago £937. Last year the produce of the same machine sold at a dead loss of £836. The pressure every day becomes worse.”

The only other Scotch case which he would mention was one that was described in the following terms:—

“In 1856 they purchased a mill that produced an average of eighteen to twenty tons a week. In 1859 and 1860 had overcome the first difficulties, and were beginning to prosper, but the Repeal of the Customs duty and the retention of the duty on the export of rags were too much to contend against, and in 1862 the firm was in the Gazette. The hard and long struggle ended in utter ruin to the proprietors, and 250 people were thrown out of employment, many of whom are still suffering. The property (in 1856) was worth £50,000, and remains unsold to this day."

It would be rather a queer thing if, being an Irishman, he neglected to speak of the wrongs of his own country. He would assure the right hon. Gentleman that he had himself entertained the most sanguine hopes that the repeal of the Excise duty upon paper, of course retaining the Customs duty, would have resulted in advantage to Ireland, where labour was plentiful, and where beautiful sites and sweet water abounded. He had been so carried away by the prospects that he saw opened up for the trade, which was so peculiarly suited to Ireland, that he would at that time have undertaken the responsibility of inducing his friends to join him in starting a company to compete with Englishmen in manufacture of paper. Thank God he had not touched it. Belfast was the seat of a great and flourishing industry. The men of Belfast were equal in energy and enterprize to the men of Manchester or the men of any part in England or Scotland. He had a letter from Mr. Archer, of Belfast, whose name he had no delicacy in mentioning, because that gentleman had left the trade. Mr. Archer said—

"We were in hopes of being able to dispose of the concern, but had no offer from a purchaser, as no one seems inclined to go into the trade in its present state. We had, therefore, no alternative but to shut down our mill and dismiss our hands, of whom we used to employ about 140. We have closed for about six months, and the sorts of paper we made were 'long elephant' for room paper and printings. Although we had every advantage of cheap labour and an excellent concern, we found ourselves totally unable to compete in the London market with the Belgian and French paper manufactured of rags, bought at a price made artificially so much lower than ours, by the heavy export duties which Foreign Governments impose for the benefit of their own paper makers. Two other paper makers in our neighbourhood gave up the business—one of them having been made a bankrupt. It is most galling to us to be obliged to keep our mill idle, and pay the rent of the water-power, besides losing all benefit from the capital we had expended in buildings and machinery."

An unfortunate gentleman wrote to say that his father was now out of the paper trade, having lost his reason owing to a failure in business consequent on the repeal of the paper duties. Early in the Session the right hon. Member for the University of Dublin referred to a letter from Mr.

Greer, who was a Protestant gentleman from the North of Ireland, who had established himself within some miles of Cork. Mr. Greer was a model of energy, ability, and industry. At one time—that was before the repeal of the Customs duty on foreign paper—he employed 300 hands in two mills; and competed on fair terms with the English manufacturers, so that even during the fearful years of famine the district round his works was like an oasis in the desert. The people employed in these mills were happy, healthy, and contented, while around them on every side there was nothing but misery and despair. Now, however, Mr. Greer had been obliged to dismiss half his people, many of whom had relapsed into abject poverty, while others had emigrated. This, then, was the present actual condition of the paper trade as it was affected by foreign taxation. So far, at all events, he (Mr. Maguire) had not indulged in mere fanciful declamation, but had given facts enough, he hoped, to arrest the attention of the British Parliament. If they waited for ten years more, there would be a larger list of casualties, a longer list of killed and wounded. But Government should bestir themselves at once, for Parliament would never see a meritorious body of men and a large industry sacrificed to carry out what was a hollow mockery of the great principle of free trade. It might be said, and had been said by the right hon. Gentleman, "The British manufacturers have exported largely; how, then, can they be suffering?" But what did the right hon. Gentleman call a large export? Was one-fourteenth of their produce a large export? The paper manufacturers produced paper to the value of £7,000,000 a year, and, according to the Board of Trade, they exported £500,000 worth of that produce. Mr. Wrigley said he was exporting scores and scores of tons of paper, in order to find a new market and break new ground. Men of large capital were obliged to keep their hands and their mills at full work. At present they would not give in, but he had heard men with £200,000 or £300,000 embarked in the trade say, "The time must come when we also must be crushed." The right hon. Gentleman would say, "Oh, but you now have new materials." And an hon. and gallant Friend of his had said to him, "Why, you can get any amount of raw material in India." No doubt of it; but if large quantities of new material were introduced, the result would be to reduce the price of rags; and if the price of rags was reduced, the British manufacturer got no benefit, standing then in exactly the same relative position as before with his rivals in foreign countries. The existing engine of tyranny was so admirably constructed that neither the rise nor the fall in the price of rags was of advantage to the British manufacturer. As a homely illustration, he would take the four wheels in a carriage. Did the House ever see the hind wheel overtake the fore wheel? If the price of rags was low here, it was proportionally low in Belgium, France, and Prussia, with this advantage to the foreign manufacturers—that, behind the protection hedge afforded by their custom-houses, the price was lower to them by the amount of the export duty than it stood at in the English market. High or low, it was all the same benefit to the protected foreigner, and all the same injury to the British victim of so-called free trade. Where, then, was the special benefit to the British maker—so far as regarded price—of introducing new raw materials? Another question asked was, “Why cannot rags be as low here as they are in countries where this protective system exists?” The answer, of course, was, “Because we have an open market.” When the Americans could buy here to advantage, they took large quantities of rags from this country; at other times they purchased in the continental markets. Thus the price here was kept up to the price of foreign rags plus the duty. Take the waste from jute as an instance how the system worked. Jute was imported here from India free of duty. A Frenchman came here and took away his jute free of duty. In France it was spun, and sent to Dundee free of duty. But the paper manufacturer at Dundee, who wanted the refuse of this jute from France in order to make his paper, must pay duty upon it at the French custom house. This was our free trade. And what was the opinion of foreigners respecting what we had done for our paper makers? Mr. Potter, a large manufacturer, was travelling some time since in the North of Spain, and fell in with a French gentleman, who said to him, “Your new British legislation seems very favourable to us foreigners.” He said that he was going to join two relatives, one of whom knew something about paper making, and that they meant to embark £20,000 apiece in establishing a mill in the South of France; and he added, “We always thought you a clever people, but now our wonder is that you can be such utter fools.” This was the opinion of foreigners, who, being themselves protected, were taking every advantage of our blunders, were adopting every improvement in mills and machinery which they could find in this country, and were then sending their paper here to deprive our paper makers of their legitimate profits. The Chancellor of the Exchequer boasted that not only were the six farthings of the abolished Exise duty given to the consumer, but three farthings additional. Whence, then, did these three farthings come? They came out of the trade—out of the capital, the industry, the brain, the energies of these men; but this was not a thing of which a British Government ought to boast. The right hon. Gentleman denied that the manufacturers had suffered. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I never denied it.] Did not the right hon. Gentleman say that no harm would result to them from his measures? Did he not say that they were like all the men who fancied that they would become victims to free trade, and that they would be all right by-and-bye? Did he not practically deny that they had suffered when he said in effect some time back that their complaints were not justified by the facts? Well, if the House was still incredulous about the facts, let them grant a Committee. The paper manufacturers had been mocked at in the House of Commons, and derided in Downing Street, and the country was under the belief, which had been expressed by the President of the Board of Trade, that they were manufacturing such large quantities of paper, and were sending such large quantities out of the country, that they could not be badly off. The fact was, however, that all classes of the trade were suffering—that the small manufacturers were being driven into bankruptcy, and that large men were working without profit, or at a loss; and if the same policy were persisted in for the next half-dozen years, very little would be heard of the paper trade in England, and the Government might then make the noble and patriotic boast that they had handed over a large and valuable native industry to foreigners, who had grown rich at our expense. The right hon. Gentleman might say, “What is your policy?” He admitted that this was a very embarrassing question when asked a short time ago; but it was not his business to point out a remedy, for he was only a private Member, not an organized Opposition. The injury done to the trade had not been inflicted by him, but against his earnest and repeated remonstrances. It was the Government who had done the wrong—it was for the Government to find the remedy. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had no more zealous supporter of his treaty policy than he was. He gave the right hon. Gentleman the fullest credit for what he had accomplished in concert with the hon. Member for Rochdale. They had linked the two nations by bonds which were stronger than any other bonds could be; and as long as France and England were united by that mutual interest which sprang from a free interchange of trade, we might diminish our war expenditure, and lessen the number of our iron-clads. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might afford to stand up in that House and admit he had made a blunder in this case. The hon. Member for Rochdale might also afford to stand up and say, “I am the author of free trade; I have conferred blessings on millions of my fellow-countrymen, but I have made a serious mistake in this individual case.” The paper manufacturers asked for some redress for their wrongs. He was not in a position to say what the remedy ought to be; but the Government had done them the wrong, and the Government ought to give them an opportunity of proving their case, and ought then to provide a remedy. If the Government did not do this, the evil would grow to such gigantic and appalling dimensions that the time would come when that House would either hurl the present Administration from office, or compel them to obey the will of a generous and just Parliament. He had concluded his task. He asked in the name of those men to be heard before a Committee of that House, in order that they might vindicate their honour and character in the face of Parliament and the country, and prove they had a case which entitled them to redress from the Legislature.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present position of the Paper Manufacture of Great Britain and Ireland, with respect to Foreign Taxation.”—(Mr. Maguire.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the Question of the paper trade has for a considerable time passed out of my hands, and is in the Department of my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. M. Gibson), who will be prepared to state his views on the subject. But the House will not be surprised if I rise to make a few observations on the speech of the hon. Gentleman. Considering that so much of that speech has been addressed to myself, I should hardly have thought it consistent with due respect to the hon. Gentleman to have remained silent after his remarks. I am, however, bound to say that I cannot enter into a discussion of this question, even on a limited scale, without stating that the hon. Gentleman must be responsible for the result of this debate. As far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned, they have no objection to any inquiry which the House may think fit to direct; but it is my duty to state what I think of the nature, tendency, and result of discussions such as this, and at present I wish, in the interest of the paper makers, to enter on this discussion under a protest. The discussion of this question is raised by themselves, and therefore the Government will not be responsible for any bad results which on their showing may arise from having their affairs debated here. The period at which the hon. Gentleman makes this Motion renders it difficult for one to understand what it is he wishes to do. He speaks on the 19th of July, after the Appropriation Bill has been introduced, and, of course, he cannot expect that a Select Committee can be appointed to undertake such an inquiry as he proposes and report during the present Session.

MR. MAGUIRE: I shall be quite satisfied if the Government will state that, at the opening of next Session, they will accede to the appointment of a Committee without one word of discussion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: That is an explicit statement, and I will endeavour to meet it in a manner that will, I trust, be satisfactory to the hon. Gentleman. I do not think it right that any pledge should be given as to the particular course to be taken at a future and somewhat distant time, because, in the meantime, circumstances may occur to render such a course unnecessary; but I have distinctly stated that, whether at that time, at this time, or at any other time, the Government have no wish or desire to prevent any inquiry which the House may think fit to direct; and it is in that spirit, next Session, we shall meet the proposal of the hon. Gentleman. And he makes a stipulation—that the Committee should be appointed without any discussion whatever—to which I have no objection whatever. I think it will be much better for the truth of the case, and for the interests of the parties concerned, that it should be so; and if it should be the wish of the House to have an inquiry they will not find the Government setting themselves against it. Having said so much as to an inquiry, I proceed to notice the remarks of the hon. Gentleman. He says that in 1853 Mr. James Wilson defined the penny Customs duty not as a protection to the paper manufacturer but as an equivalent for the duty on rags; and he says I endorsed that definition. It is difficult to speak from memory of an occurrence which took place eleven years ago; but subject to that reservation, I beg to say that the penny Customs duty proposed by me as Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Earl of Aberdeen's Government was proposed not because we thought it a just compensation for the duty on rags, but because we thought it right to proceed step by step downwards in our transition from a high rate of duty to a state of free trade, and because we thought there was a plea at that time for a reduction of the duty as long as the principle of a Customs duty was not brought in question. But do not let it be supposed that ever there was any recognition of the proposition which has been advanced by the hon. Gentleman. Mr. James Wilson is not here to speak for himself, but I am, and I state that the duty of a penny was proposed entirely on grounds of policy, and without any pledge such as the hon. Gentleman imagines being given in 1853. Then the hon. Gentleman says we have departed from the principle of free trade and of Sir Robert Peel—that principle being that you should not seek to abolish protection for the British manufacturer, and expose him to competition without giving him a free use of the raw material of his manufacture. Now, the hon. Gentleman has fallen into and used language here which is calculated grossly to mislead. What does he mean by free trade? Does he mean to say that we in this country are to base our policy on the principle of free trade, leaving other nations to follow our example as soon as they may see the advantages of doing so, but not depriving our own people of the advantages of free trade because the people of other countries are not sufficiently advanced in the principles of economical science to follow the same policy? Are we to do that, or are we to remain inactive till every other Government abolishes protective duties, and every other country comes up to the same standard of economical knowledge? The principle of Sir Robert Peel was that, as far as the Government could do so, in subjecting the British manufacturer to competition with the manufactures of other nations, they should give them every advantage of raw material; but I challenge the hon. Member to produce from Sir Robert Peel's speeches any statement that free trade in this country was to wait for the halting advances of other countries. Are our people to be deprived of the advantages of free trade, and subject to the evils of protection, because other Governments won't do justice to the people whose affairs they manage? The hon. Gentleman states that I informed the House the duty on rags had been repealed in Italy. That is not quite correct. What I did on the occasion to which the hon. Member refers was to quote from a Parliamentary paper a document in the possession of the House. I believe the inference drawn from that paper was incorrect; but I never pretended to give information not in the possession of the House.

MR. MAGUIRE: You first expressed a doubt; but subsequently, when answering questions, you said, "I had a doubt earlier in the evening, but now I have no doubt. I state it as a fact."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No, I did not.

MR. MAGUIRE: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I made the statement from reference to a document in the possession of the House. No information on the subject was given by me as a Minister. The hon. Gentleman has also referred to certain figures which I quoted as supplied to me by a gentleman in the paper trade. Those figures went to show a diminution in the cost of manufacture, which I myself described as surprising; but, when I gave those figures to the House, I stated that they were open to others to examine, because the gentleman had kindly allowed me to make use of his name. I am sure the hon. Gentleman will do me the justice to say I quoted those figures as they were given to me. [MR. MAGUIRE: Hear!] And that they were not presented on my authority; but I must be permitted to observe that, whether they were good or whether they were bad, he has not met them. He only says that in the month of May the shares of the company were at a discount of 61 per cent; but he has not stated what they were at before those figures were made up.

MR. MAGUIRE: The company had not begun then.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: When did the first sale of shares begin, and at what price? The hon. Gentleman has overlooked the fact that though they might have been at a discount of 60 per cent in May, before then they might have been at a greater discount still.

MR. MAGUIRE: Why, it was a new company.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Is there no such thing in this country as the shares of a company being at 60 per cent discount?

MR. BUXTON: It cannot be a very flourishing company.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I never said it was very flourishing. Let the matter be examined on its merits, but I only say that the hon. Gentleman has not disposed of the case made out by those figures. The hon. Gentleman said he had given us a great many facts. I may divide the hon. Gentleman's speech into particular statements in the nature of facts—which I do not question, proceeding as they do from him—and general descriptions of the state of the paper trade; but particular statements of facts are one thing, and general descriptions are another. If I complain of anything in the speech of the hon. Member, it is of his repeated and pertinacious assertions that I have always denied the existence of distress in the paper trade. I will take the liberty of quoting what I really did say in my Financial Statement on this point. The language I then used was this—

"I am very far from representing that the state of the paper making trade is at present one of the prosperity in which we should all desire to see it, because it is affected—I think and hope for the time only—by very serious drawbacks."

The hon. Gentleman, therefore, has done me injustice by his repeated assertion that I denied that the paper makers had suffered. But that is only a secondary matter. The statements of the hon. Member which are material refer entirely, not to the condition of the trade generally, but to that of a particular class or particular persons in the trade. That is no proof of the languishing condition of the trade generally. [MR. MAGUIRE: I might have quoted fifty or sixty cases.] Well, but they are not the whole trade. As far as I was able to follow him, it appears to me that the statements of the hon. Gentleman referred to one particular class of paper makers—the makers of printing papers of middle and ordinary descriptions, which are the papers, undoubtedly, that have been brought into sharp competition with the foreign article. The hon. Gentleman jumps a great deal too fast to his conclusion when he shows a distress among certain paper makers in one particular department of the trade, and then thinks he has proved that the paper trade generally is in a ruinous condition. The hon. Gentleman says, that if we go on as we are for half-a-dozen years we shall have nothing to do except to lament over the ruin of a once flourishing trade. Is that statement borne out by the facts? I do not deny that there exists great distress in the trade; I do not deny that particular branches of the trade are suffering from severe pressure; but it is what happens to all trades in the stage of transition from a state of high protection to that of unrestricted competition with the foreigner. As regards the foreign duty on the export of rags, though it has been enormously and mischievously—for the interests of the paper makers—exaggerated, yet I do not deny that their case is a hard one, and that it is the duty of the Government to endeavour to obtain a remedy, if possible. The hon. Gentleman says that the ruin of the paper trade is that to which we are proceeding, but I say that, though our information is limited and imperfect at present, and though the Government have not the means of stating the case so well as the paper makers, that statement is confuted by the figures on our table. If the paper trade, as a whole, is a dying trade, how can the hon. Gentleman account for the fact that the number of paper makers has ceased to diminish? He says that the paper makers are becoming bankrupt, but if that general statement be a true one it must be represented in the returns we have before us of the number of paper makers. Why has not the hon. Gentleman met the figures I gave in my Financial Statement? Why has he not met the statement that whereas before the repeal of the paper duty the number of paper makers in this country appears to have been steadily and rather rapidly diminishing, the repeal has arrested that diminution. In 1838 there were 525 paper makers in this country, and in 1860 that number had fallen to 384. If the paper trade is on its road to ruin, I ask the hon. Gentleman to explain how it is that rapid diminution in the number of paper makers has been arrested? The hon. Gentleman then referred to the exports, and he says that a fourteenth part of the whole production is no great amount to be exported. But is it not somewhat remarkable that that fourteenth part is sent by the British manufacturer into neutral markets, where it has to meet the Belgian, German, French, and other manufacturers, and yet, notwithstanding that the trade, as we are told, is in a ruinous condition, the hon. Gentleman himself admits that this proportion is exported? He omits, however, altogether the strong point of the case. What is material is not merely the assertion that some portion of the paper manufactured here is exported into neutral markets, but that since the repeal of the duty that portion has greatly increased. In 1859 we exported of paper and paperhangings 115,000 cwt., and in 1864 190,000 cwt. That increase must mean something. Does it mean bankrupt makers, mills deserted, trade going to ruin, or does it mean more hands employed, more capital invested, more mills, or larger mills at work? That is the second question I propose to the hon. Gentleman for his consideration. Another point which the hon. Gentleman has not met is the immense increase in the importation of materials for paper making. His ingenious argument that the British paper maker stands between the American on one side and the foreigner on the other is no answer at all to the figures which I have given before, and which I will repeat. In 1859 we imported of materials for paper making 115,000 cwt., and in 1864 731,000 cwt. Does the hon. Gentleman think he has stated the case of the paper makers when he has overlooked a state of facts such as this? What has become of those 600,000 tons of new material? Have they been kept in warehouses, or have they not been sent into the market and made up, causing the employment of additional industry and increased capital? [Mr. MAGUIRE: But without a profit.] There, the hon. Gentleman goes on chanting the same ancient strain we have heard in all these cases of the removal of protection. It was just the same with shipbuilding when we repealed the Navigation Laws. When we pointed out that shipbuilding did not diminish we were told that it was done without a profit, that there were continual bankruptcies, but that new men came in so ignorant and so foolish as to go on wasting their money on business which yielded them no profit. I must say, therefore, that I am not at all prepared to join with the hon. Member in the dismal anticipations he has raised of the ruin of the paper trade. I submit myself to further information and correction when further information may be forthcoming; but I say that the figures which I have quoted—though not absolutely demonstrative—are a great deal more powerful, and to the purpose, as regards the general state of the trade than anything he has produced on the other side. The hon. Gentleman says that it belongs to the Government to propose a policy in this case, and to discover a remedy for the condition of the paper trade. If we say anything about improvement of processes and about the trade adapting itself to altered circumstances, and endeavouring to meet increased competition by cheaper methods, and by the more effectual application of labour and skill, we are always told that we are heartlessly exulting in the miseries of our fellow-countrymen. I will not, therefore, enter into that line of discussion, but I will enter into the remedies which have been proposed by the paper makers themselves. One was that there should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund to the paper makers a sum equal to the estimated sum they have had to pay in the price of rags brought into this country from abroad. That is a proposal, I think, which will never be made from the place in which I stand, either by myself or any other person who may succeed me; and if any Government were bold enough to make it, I do not think the House of Commons would entertain it. Another proposition was to reimpose the Customs duties on the importation of paper to the extent of 1d. per lb. In my opinion, that measure would be in the long run probably mischievous to the paper makers themselves, and inevitably unjust to the consumer, and therefore I do not think it is a remedy which will ever be applied. The third remedy is to make appeals to Foreign Governments to remove the export duty on rags. Practically that may be taken to mean appeals to the Government of France. Undoubtedly it is the duty of the Government to endeavour to induce Foreign Governments to remove, if possible, if not to reduce, their duty on the export of rags, and we have at all times endeavoured to obtain such a concession. The hon. Gentleman says that we have had no success; and if that were the fact, it is probable that the barren and fruitless agitation constantly carried on in this country by a large number of paper makers has been the main cause of that want of success. The hon. Member thinks himself entitled to assume that those who sit on these Benches are no friends of the paper makers. But I must say that the hon. Gentleman has no right to make any such assumption. I entirely repudiate the accusations which he has brought against us; and while admitting that he is doing what he thinks best for the paper makers, while doing him that justice which he refuses to do to us, I tell him that it is he that is their enemy, and that he is taking a course which is most injurious to the paper manufacturers of this country. The hon. Gentleman says that the foreigner reads what takes place here. What does the foreign paper maker read? Why, he reads that men of high character in this House say that the English manufacturers are beaten out of the market by the high export duty on rags. But the foreign paper makers are not so blind as not to see what their interest is, and the natural result is to induce them to form a combination for the purpose of maintaining the export duty. I think, therefore, that it is their friends—sincere, no doubt, but mistaken—who have been the greatest enemies to the home paper makers. I think the language which the British Government, in dealing with this export duty, would naturally use towards a Foreign Government would be, “If we are going to have a real interchange of advantages, justice demands that you should take off this duty.” But the argument of justice does not always in this wicked world carry that force which ought to belong to it, and, consequently, we must say that the argument as to the effect of the export duty has been monstrously exaggerated. No doubt the success of the trade depends in a considerable degree, but for all that in a diminishing degree, on the price of rags. In many cases paper is made without any admixture of rags whatever. In point of fact this cry of the paper makers has about it a good deal of the character of a factitious cry, and is almost suggestive of some policy which is not on the surface. How that is I am not going to say, but I am bound to state that the importance of the question has been immensely exaggerated. At the same time we admit that there is a hardship upon the British paper makers which, in common justice, ought to be removed. The hon. Member says that I made promises; but I did so in strictly limited and cautious words in the financial statement of the present year to this effect—that we were expressly authorized to hope that concessions would be made by the Government of France with regard to the export duty upon rags. Well, on that point, great progress has been made, and I am bound to say that even within two or three weeks a measure on the subject might have been adopted but for the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. Whether that Motion will admit of such a measure being adopted or not I cannot say; but the hon. Member must see that what is good for the goose is good for the gander. If the export duty on rags from France be a disadvantage to the British manufacturer, it must be a corresponding advantage to the French paper maker, and all those speeches and debates which tend to give a factitious importance to the subject tend also to encourage the protected trades in foreign countries to band themselves together for the purpose of maintaining the duty. I do not wish to enter into that subject because I am afraid that by so doing I should only be increasing and not diminishing the obstacles in the way of a reasonable arrangement; nor is it necessary to do so, as we have no practical issue at present before the House. I have frankly contested the statements of the hon. Member. I have frankly admitted that there is considerable distress in particular branches of the trade. I have stated distinctly that there is no disposition on the part of the Government to oppose themselves to any general wish for inquiry which may be entertained by the House—not now, for that is out of the question, but at some future time. At the same time I have thought it but fair, candid, and honest, to say with regard to the parties interested, that I am firmly convinced it would be much better for them to let this matter remain for a while in silence, inasmuch as I do not think the result of this Motion can be anything else than that Her Majesty's Government should make renewed representations to Foreign Governments—representations which it would have been our duty to have made of ourselves, and in that case perhaps with as much probability of success.

MR. SURTEES said, that after the statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which he had heard with much pleasure, he did not think it necessary to offer any remarks upon the question.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he did not see much good in fighting over again battles which had been already fought on a much larger scale; nor did he think it wise to ask for a Committee of this kind unless there were good grounds for believing that the decision to which the House had come, after long debate and minute consideration, had been erroneous. Moreover he did not think that the hon. Gentleman had made out his case. He rested it very much on the failure of a particular company, the prospectus of which he had exhibited to the House. He had, moreover, read letters written in this year, to prove the destitution of the trade. Yet the company, to which he had alluded, had been formed in 1863. This was a year after the change had been made, and nearly two years after the country were pretty well aware that such a change was imminent. The promoters said their object was to "take advantage of the impulse given to the paper manufacture by the new legislation," and that they were about to "commence operations under circumstances peculiarly favourable." This then was the opinion of the paper makers in June, 1863. Had the trade been utterly ruined in one year? The hon. Gentleman said that this company had failed. But they were not merely a company for making paper, but also for manufacturing manure, for which object they had increased their capital and erected large works. With two such different objects they had very little chance of success. The hon. Gentleman was favourable to the removal of the Excise duty, but held that the Customs duties should have been retained in order to prevent foreign competition. But the effect of that would be to put money into the pocket of the British manufacturer at the expense of the consumer, so that the hon. Gentleman was not fighting the battle of the nation, but of a small fraction of the community. When the manufacturers had to pay an Excise duty, as well as the equivalent Customs duty, they admitted (in the prospectus) that "large fortunes had been made. When both Excise and Customs duties had been removed the balance was not disturbed, and large fortunes might still be expected to be realized. But there was a duty on the export of foreign rags. The effect of that was that rags were increased in price to the British manufacturer, above what they would be if there were no such duty; but it was found that though there was an increase in the price of rags still there was a large margin of profit. Notwithstanding that export duty, our manufacturers had shown that paper could be exported from England with profit, and that they could compete successfully in foreign markets. Under these circumstances he was astonished that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had promised to agree to the nomination of a Select Committee. He was still more astonished that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have pledged himself to do so next year, when perhaps the same Parliament would not be assembled within these walls.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he thought that no one who had given an unprejudiced attention to the subject would agree with the noble Lord, for if ever a case for inquiry and redress had been made out it was by the temperate and able speech of the hon. Member for Dungarvan. He regretted that only one Irish representative had hitherto spoken a word for the distressed class whose claims had been urged by the hon. Member. The Chancellor of the Exchequer claimed credit for his frankness in dealing with the subject; but he thought he had never heard a case argued with less frankness. The right hon. Gentleman said that the hon. Member was inflicting injury on the paper maker by proclaiming abroad the knowledge of the injury of which he complained. But any injury done by the hon. Member for Dungarvan could not approach to that inflicted by the right hon. Gentleman in showing the foreign paper maker, as he had done that night, how to utilize the complaints of the English paper makers and turn them to the greatest advantage. The great principle of the late Sir Robert Peel, as was admitted by the right hon. Gentleman, was to secure for the people access to the raw material. That was all that was asked for in that case. The right hon. Gentleman said that only one class of paper makers suffered, but all must be more or less injured by the present state of things, and all would be benefited if they could get their rags from other countries on the same terms as the foreigner. The right hon. Gentleman charged the hon. Member with having embarked in a barren and fruitless agitation. The complaints of the paper makers, however, had been on more than one occasion brought under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman, yet he had never until that night told them that their grievances would probably shortly be redressed. It was true that Parliament could not compel foreign countries to reduce the export duties on their rags, but the Government could introduce a system of give and take in a commercial treaty, and it would be very easy to induce Foreign Governments to adopt a system of reciprocity and of really free trade.

MR. NORRIS said, that as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given a promise of a Committee in the next Session, it would not be necessary for him to detain the House at any length; but owing to the unaccountable silence of the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden), to whom allusion had been made, and who might be said to be the apostle of the policy which had been discussed, he thought it necessary to refer to one or two of the statements of the right hon. Gentleman. The country had been taught to believe, and the hon. Member for Rochdale had laid it down as a maxim, that traders and consumers should be enabled to buy in the cheapest market, and the producers were entitled to open up channels of sale in the dearest markets. That was a sound principle, and he was glad that it pervaded all our legislation in modern times; but that legislation ought not to be exceptionally interfered with. If, however, it were true that the English paper maker had been for a long series of years debarred from access to the raw material, the system was not one of free trade but of protection to the foreigner against the English producer of paper. He was astonished to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer affirm that the number of letters quoted by the hon. Member for Dungarvan did not prove his case. Of those fifty or sixty paper manufacturers some had gone into the Bankruptcy Court, others were working at a considerable loss, others were working half time, and the whole complained that they were making no profit. By the Board of Trade Return of licences it appeared that the whole number of paper manufacturers was not more than 397 or 400. [MR. MAGUIRE: That is the number of mills.] It thus appeared that one-eighth of the whole number were in circumstances of difficulty and distress. Such a proportion of the entire number would be sufficient to satisfy any ordinary person that their complaints were not without foundation. A parallel case would be to suppose that, the conflict in America being at an end, the United States Government finding themselves with an exhausted exchequer, determined to put a heavy duty on the export of raw cotton. The manufacture of cotton fabrics in America would then be stimulated, and our cotton manufacturers would have to struggle on the one hand against a heavier export duty on their raw material, and a free importation of the manufactured article. The whole of the English cotton districts would complain, and the result would be the ruin of the cotton trade. The cotton manufacturers would not be satisfied with a quiet remonstrance in that House against this unjust legislation, but the millions of men who would be thrown out of work and the capitalists would be up in arms. Precisely the same state of things now existed in the production of paper. Or let them take the analogy of the sugar duties. Some time ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer recommended, and the House adopted, a differential scale of duties upon sugar, on the ground that it would place English and foreign refiners upon a complete equality. What was now desired was that the English paper maker, who was only a refiner of rags, should be placed in a similar position with regard to his foreign competitors. The fact that the exportation of paper had increased from 115,000 cwt. in 1859 to nearly 200,000 cwt. in 1864 did not prove that there had been an increase of the quantity of paper produced in this country. The fact was that the home consumers being supplied with paper from Germany, France, and Belgium, our manufacturers had been obliged to seek new markets, and to send their paper almost all over the world, in the hope that somebody would buy it. If, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, we were not to wait for other countries, but to set them a glorious example by the complete adoption of free trade principles, he should like to ask the hon. Member for Rochdale how it was that when those great principles were discussed between the Governments of England and France we entered into a treaty in which the raw material was entirely forgotten at the same time that the Customs duty was taken off the manufactured article?

MR. BLACK said, he wished distinctly to deny the truth of the assertion that the paper question had been settled according to the principles of free trade. It had been settled according to principles of protection, and protection in its worst form. When there was a duty upon corn, it was argued, and justly argued, that the duty raised the price, not only of the corn which was imported, but of all the corn in the country. And the same was the case with regard to paper. The duty upon rags ranged from £5 to £9 per ton, increasing the price of the manufactured article by 30 or 40 per cent. If the duty was taken off, the whole of that 30 or 40 per cent would not be received by the producer. He would get only the regular trade profit, and the greater portion of the duty would be received by the consumer, who would pay less for his paper. The difference between the tax upon corn and the duty on rags was, that while the produce of the former went into our Exchequer, we allowed the latter to go into that of the foreigner. Some time ago we heard very vehement denunciations of the taxes upon knowledge. What had become of those who were so earnest then now that there was a question of reducing the price of rags? No argument could be founded upon the increase of the exportation of paper from this country. The trade was in a state of depression—manufacturers must exert themselves to find markets wherever they could—and the kinds of goods generally exported were writing papers and account books, which went to our own colonies. The fact was that the increase had only been from 91,958 cwt. in 1861 to 129,326 cwt. in 1862, and 154,910 cwt. in 1863, an increase fully accounted for by the increase of the population and wealth of our colonies; and it must not be overlooked that during the same period our importation of paper had increased by 300 per cent. Then again there were some wealthy manufacturers who made the finest paper, but by and bye the foreign manufacturer would supply himself with the best machinery, and be able to compete with them in that branch of the trade. There were those who seemed to look with great complacency on the position of the paper makers, contending that things would right themselves; but how, he would ask, could they do so? We imposed a heavy weight on the home manufacturer, leaving the foreigner unencumbered, and it was under those circumstances easy to see who was likely to win the race. As an illustration of how matters at present stood, he might mention that one mill in his own neighbourhood, which had some years ago been purchased for £45,000, was lying idle, the person who bought it having become a bankrupt, and would gladly be sold for half the money which it had cost. Nor did he for a moment think that the Arcadian view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was about to be realized, and that those small mills of which he formerly spoke in such eloquent terms were likely to spring up throughout the country. Believing, he might add, that the present was a system of protection of the very worst kind, that it operated with crushing weight on our own manufacturers, he must express a hope that the injury which had been done would as far as possible be remedied.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, that whether or not, free trade was the question before them, all parties had admitted that a portion of the paper manufacturing trade was in a suffering condition. He could not understand the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he said that they must look only to the question as a whole. He maintained that it was their duty to listen to all who had a grievance, especially when the grievance had been caused by the legislation of Parliament. He, therefore, thought it was the bounden duty of the House to take into its serious consideration the complaints of those whose grievances had been so ably detailed by the hon. Member for Dungarvan that evening. In answering that speech, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said the duty of doing so did not properly belong to his own department, and then turned round to the President of the Board of Trade, who, after the arguments which had been advanced on both sides of the House, would, one would have supposed, have spoken on the subject. Instead of taking that course, however, the right hon. Gentleman had in American phrase "skedaddled," omitting to say a single word in defence of his own department. Again, the Chancellor of the Exchequer informed the hon. Member for Dungarvan, towards the close of his speech, that if he had not made so mischievous a statement, calculated, as he said it was, to produce so bad an effect on foreign countries, the Government would in a very few days in all probability have been able to announce that France had done something to meet the unfortunate case of the paper manufacturers. But why, under those circumstances, had he not communicated with the hon. Member before he brought the question forward, and assigned as a reason for its postponement that there was a likelihood of France taking immediate steps to meet his wishes? Why, too, he would ask, was the hon. Member for Rochdale silent upon the question, as well as the President of the Board of Trade? He had been given to understand that at the time the hon. Gentleman was negotiating the French Treaty, it was supposed that it would include the reduction of the export duty. He had heard it even stated that the Emperor of the French entertained that notion, but that he had not been able to resist the representations made to him by his own manufacturers, and that he had actually said, "This cannot take place, but I give you leave in consequence to withdraw part of your pledges." As to the case as it stood, it was impossible, after the statements from Scotland, Ireland, and England, which the hon. Member for Dungarvan had read, that hon. Members could allow these paper manufacturers to sit "like patience on a monument smiling at grief," and not pronounce their opinions on the subject. Indeed, the country was, he thought, greatly indebted to the hon. Member for having brought the matter forward, for it was no question of altering the system of free trade which had been accepted, and of which the French Treaty in fact was itself an abandonment. He was glad to find that since the conclusion of that treaty our commerce with France had increased, and he trusted our friendly relations with the French people might be made to depend, not solely on the political, but also on the commercial interests of the two nations. But while he desired as much as any one that result, he could not refuse to listen to the complaints of our own manufacturers, and it was with satisfaction, therefore, he found that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had expressed his readiness to grant a Committee next year to investigate the matter.

MR. WATKIN said, that the hon. Gentleman who brought forward the Motion had argued the question as if the raw material out of which English paper was manufactured mainly consisted of foreign rags; and if that were so, there would be a very great deal in what had been said. He was sure, however, that he was not far from the mark when he said that the proportion of those foreign rags, on account of which so much complaint was made of the admirable treaty which the hon. Member for Rochdale had been the means of bringing to a conclusion, did not constitute more than 15 per cent of the materials used in English paper making. The raw material which the English paper makers used in the largest proportion was cotton waste. In consequence of the American war the value of the cotton waste was 400 per cent greater than formerly. The result of that exceptional state of things was that many paper makers must suffer from distress, but instead of showing that they had a strong case of difficulty to encounter, they turned upon the hon. Member for Rochdale, and said that all their distress was the consequence of the export duty on foreign rags, which constituted only an exceedingly small proportion of the whole raw material used in paper making. As there was to be a Committee in connection with the case of these 400 paper manufacturers, it would be right to know the amount of income tax which those gentlemen paid for three, four, or five years before, and subsequent to, the conclusion of the French Treaty; and he believed that an honest and fair return would show, notwithstanding the exceptional circumstance to which he had alluded, that in consequence of the opening of new markets, not only in this country, through cheap literature, but elsewhere, the profits of the paper makers had diminished but little or not at all. If they were to have a Committee on the state of the paper trade, suffering in consequence of the American war, why should there not be a Committee on the state of the cotton manufacturers, who constituted a much larger interest, and who had not come crawling on the floor of that House asking for an inquiry into an exceptional state of things?

MR. MAGUIRE, in reply, said, that the hon. Member for Stockport might have refrained from indulging in terms so offensive to the paper makers, who did not come crawling to that House in formâ pauperis, but stood up boldly and manfully, and simply demanded justice. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think he had made a wonderful discovery when he said that the foreign rags from France and Germany only constituted 15 per cent of the raw material used in English paper making, but the argument would not have been one bit stronger if the proportion were only 5 per cent; because it was the value of those foreign rags which regulated the entire price of the whole of the raw material which the British paper manufacturer used. His hon. Friend near him (Sir Minto Farquhar) had said that if the Government had stated that they were in negotiation with foreign Powers on the subject, the trade would have been unwise to bring forward the subject now; but he was bound in candour to declare that delusive hopes had been occasionally held out, which time had utterly falsified. He had heard a whisper the other night—in fact, he had been semi-officially advised—that he had better not bring forward the matter; upon which he said that he would confer with the trade, and leave the decision to them; and having left the decision to the trade, they requested him by all means to go on with his Motion, for they had been deceived before, and might be deceived again. The noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire said that this was a battle, not for the British public, but for a trade, and that the object was to make paper dear. With every respect for the noble Lord, his assertion was entirely destitute of fact. Reduce the cost of the raw material, and you reduce the price of the manufactured article. Place the British maker on an equal footing in the rag market with the foreigner, and you may leave to the foreigner all his natural advantages—such as cheaper labour—and the British maker will be content to meet him in any market in the world. Give the British manufacturer free access to the rag market, and they would have the manufactured article cheaper than now, with the satisfaction of knowing that the man who made it gained a fair profit by his industry and capital. The hon. Member for Rochdale had said that he did not speak exactly the words he had attributed to him, but there were other words which the hon. Gentleman had not spoken, but deliberately put in writing. There was a controversy between the hon. Gentleman and the editor of The Times. The latter had charged the hon. Gentleman with a blunder in this matter, and the hon. Gentleman in reply laid down a very singular doctrine. He said it was our duty in carrying out the principle of free trade to buy in the cheapest and to sell in the dearest market, and he added, "If Foreign Governments put foolish restrictions on the export of rags, it is an additional reason why we should take their paper." He never heard anything like that in all his life, and he only wished he had alluded to that opinion when the hon. Member was present. [An hon. MEMBER: He is here.] He had the highest esteem for the hon. Gentleman, and sympathized with his general principles and with his splendid triumphs, but he never heard more inconsequential nonsense than this doctrine. He would say a word with respect to his own connection with the present Motion, and also as to the time at which it was brought forward. First as to the time. In March last the trade sent in a memorial to the Government, but the answer to that memorial was not given until May. A Motion for inquiry was to have been made by an hon. Gentleman present, who, from some cause or other, changed his intention—at any rate, did not persevere with it. When that change of intention was made known to the trade, a deputation from the body waited on him (Mr. Maguire), and requested him to bring the question before the House. Sympathizing though he did with their wrongs, he at first refused, and alleged as one of the reasons of his refusal, the necessity of his going to Ireland; but when they urged the matter very strongly upon him, he agreed to do it. He then tried the chance of ballot—and that night was the first free night he could obtain for the present Motion. So that the responsibility of forcing the case upon the attention of the House did not rest with him, but with the trade—who, he might add, thoroughly understood their own interests, and what would serve or what would injure them. It was said that the cases that he had mentioned did not fully represent the state of the trade. His answer was that the trade, with scarcely an exception, endorsed the facts and arguments put forward in those letters. When they met in Manchester in January last, there were one hundred firms then personally represented, and fifty more were represented by letter, and at that meeting statements of the same character were accepted by those present, who might be said to have spoken in the name of six-sevenths of the trade, or production, of the United Kingdom. Why had not more given up, he was asked? He (Mr. Maguire) thought the list was long and sad enough; but it should be remembered that people held on in the hope of better days, and that many were endeavouring by increased production to reduce their fixed charges—for rent, taxes, management, &c.—and thus live by a fractional share of profit. The case of the trade was now before the House and the country, and it could not fail to evoke general sympathy in their behalf. He was quite satisfied with the assurance which had been given by the Government. He did not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer had answered his statement or disproved one tittle of the case he had made out. He (Mr. Maguire) had laid down no principle, or made no assertion which he had not fortified by facts, and he believed he had made a fair and candid speech, and was certainly not open to the charge of having represented British manufacturers in the House of Commons in a crawling spirit. He begged leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

NAVY—SHIPS OF WAR—ARMOUR- PLATING.

COMMISSION MOVED FOR.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH, in rising to move an Address for a Commission to inquire into the system of Building Ships of War in this Country and in other countries, and to report what beneficial changes may be made, begged to state that he had been in hopes that some of his gallant Friends connected with the navy, or hon. Members interested in shipping, would have brought forward the question, and he for that reason had delayed taking it up till now. He felt he was hardly competent to give a professional opinion on the matter, yet he believed his Motion would be of use in eliciting a discussion that would prove useful to the service. At that moment we were building ships of various kinds, and the question was, which description would be of most value to the country? He had no desire to censure the Board of Admiralty. No member of that House had a greater respect for the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty, who carried out his duties in a manner creditable to himself and advantageous to the country, but he was anxious to ascertain whether in the fleet they were constructing they were pursuing the wisest and most economical course. They were now building ships of wood, of iron, partly of wood and partly of iron, some of them iron-cased partially, and others iron-cased wholly. Over and over again the House had been told that the time of the Lords of the Admiralty was so occupied that it was impossible for them to devote to the subject the attention which it deserved. He had been Chairman of the Committee to inquire into the state of the gunboats, and Sir Baldwin Walker told the Committee in what manner the authority was given for the construction of a ship. He stated that he desired the constructor to make drawings of a ship, that he examined those drawings, and signed them, and made what was called a submission to the Lords of the Admiralty, laying his plans on the table. They were discussed as such things could be discussed in a board, and generally the first naval Lord signed his name to the drawings, and the work was performed; and yet the builders stated that, however faulty the plans submitted to them for their construction might be, they never presumed to make the slightest alteration in them. Under these circumstances the only security the country had was in the talent and experience of the Chief Constructor of the Navy, and he wished to ask if they had in the Chief Constructor recently appointed that experience in shipbuilding and that description of talent which justified them in placing the fleet under his entire control. He had heard from many quarters that the new Constructor was a man of considerable ability, and he had no doubt that he was so, but talent was not all that was required. The Constructor ought to be a man of great experience, who had been employed continuously in the construction of ships, and who would be able to say at once where strength should be added and blemishes removed. Vessels from 6,000 down to 700 tons were constantly being built. They were constructed in very different ways, and varied in proportion, in material, and in armament in a most extraordinary manner. It was impossible to say when a ship was ordered to be constructed what guns she would carry, and it appeared that this point, this vital point, was never settled till after the vessel was launched; instead of the only rational course of building a ship suitable for a definite battery. That magnificent ship the Warrior was built to carry 40 guns, yet she was now only to carry 20. He was old enough to remember when the cost of a ship was estimated at £1,000 per gun. That sum not only found the ship, but the armament and the entire equipment. A vast change had since taken place in that respect. It appeared from Returns presented to the House by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, that the Agincourt, the Minotaur, and the Northumberland, each of which were of 6,621 tons, were only to carry 26 guns. They were of iron but only partially plated. The Warrior and Black Prince, of 6,109 tons and originally intended to carry 40 guns, were now to carry 20 only. These two were only partially iron-plated and of iron. The Achilles was of 6,121 tons, and was to carry only 20 guns; she was of iron and only partially iron-plated; but he hoped the noble Lord would correct him if he was wrong. He had heard, but he did not know, that she was now to be more completely plated than originally intended. Then the Hector, of only 4,020 tons, was to carry 24 guns, while the Achilles with a third more tonnage was to carry only 20. What was more remarkable was that the Valiant, although smaller than either, was to carry 34 guns. He had no doubt the Admiralty Return he quoted from was quite correct. Then, again, the Bellerophon, which was larger than the Valiant, being of 4,446 tons, was only to carry 14 guns. [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: Her guns are of much larger calibre.] That would enable her to throw a heavier broadside, and was therefore a point which must be borne in mind, but the Returns did not give the information. The Caledonia, of about 4,000 tons, was wholly armour-plated and a wooden ship. The Bellerophon was an iron ship and partly armour-plated. The Royal Oak was of wood, and wholly armour-plated. The Ocean was of wood, of a little more than 4,000 tons and wholly armour-plated. The Prince Consort was of 4,000 tons, and was to have 35 guns. Why was the Caledonia to have much heavier guns than the Bellerophon? If the Bellerophon's armament was good for a man-of-war of 4,000 tons it ought to be applied to the Caledonia also. But nothing was ever more capricious than the present system of armament; every thing about it was complex and costly where simplicity was required. He doubted whether the noble Lord had the guns of large calibre in sufficient quantity. If we were in the right groove, let us continue in it; if not, let us change it. If the Government had nothing to hide, nothing to stifle, they would grant the inquiry for which he asked; and as Parliament was about to break up, it was very important that the House and the country should know how the enormous sum to be spent before they met again was going to be laid out. A French author of some celebrity stated what the right hon. Member for Droitwich would no doubt be slow to admit—namely, that the Warrior would have no chance, through not being protected at the bow and stern, against a vessel like La Gloire, which was armour-plated all round. He hoped that was not so; but the Warrior was an experiment, and he would ask, was it not intended to disarm the bow and stern of the Black Prince and the Warrior? His right hon. Friend said his object in regard to the Warrior was to get a great speed, and he believed that with a clean bottom she would steam from 14 to 15 knots an hour. His right hon. Friend would say that if the bow and stern had not been made so sharp she would not have attained that velocity. That was one of the points which required investigation. The proper way to deal with a question of this kind was not to leave it in the hands of the noble Lord and his colleagues on the Treasury Bench, because in a year or two they might be replaced by other Gentlemen with totally different views. He wanted something specific to be laid down, not for the purpose of controlling the Government or the Admiralty, but with the view of advising and assisting them, and it is lamentable to see how much they want that assistance. A vote of the House, so far from being a reproach to the Admiralty, would strengthen them. He knew nothing except from the newspapers, but he had read that two vessels recently constructed, and called the Research and the Enterprise, were fitted up, not with the ordinary broadside batteries, but with guns in a sort of box, 33ft. by 32ft. square, in which four guns were used. Any man acquainted with the requirements of ventilation would know that space would be quite inadequate. These four guns ought to be capable of being used at the same time, supposing the vessel to be attacked simultaneously on both sides. It was reported that experiments had been made with these guns; but he would be glad to know at what angle they were fired. It appeared that they were not loaded with shot, but only with powder, and he was told that they were fired at an elevation, and could not be fired in any other way. That was a bad system. He found fault with these two vessels being fitted up with that box, at great expense, without having the box tried on terra firma. He had a letter in his possession from the commander of the Rolf Krake, belonging to the Danish Government, which was built on Captain Cowper Coles's system, and which had been three times in action, receiving 150 shot wounds, and that letter gave a very good description of her performance, with which the writer was perfectly satisfied. He understood that the Research, a vessel with the same armament and of the same size as the Rolf Krake, could only fire two guns in any one direction at the same time, whereas the Rolf Krake could fire her four guns at the same time and in the same direction. All that he had gathered from naval men of experience and ability gave him a bad opinion of the Research and the Enterprise. The public mind ought to be set at rest one way or other as to their real character. Then there was another important point. The ship for which they were indebted to the right hon. Member for Droitwich would steam 14 or 15 knots an hour, but they did not hear that the small vessels by which so much was promised to be done would steam 10 knots. Suppose, then, we were engaged in war. In making up our squadrons we must recollect that speed was one great element to be kept in view. What would be the consequence of sending out the Warrior along with the Research and the Enterprise? The Warrior, with her superior speed, might run up to an enemy possessing perhaps an equal armament, when her two slower consorts could not come up to her support. Length was the first element of speed; and if we were to have iron-plated ships as nearly as possible shot-proof, by plating them from stem to stern on both sides, it was clear we must, in order to obtain the proper amount of displacement, have a breadth of beam incompatible with high speed. Then there was the great question of armour-plating with regard to which a great deal of uncertainty prevailed, and many experiments had been made. First, the Warrior had 4½ in. of iron with 18 in. of teak backing; but they were not content with that, which was very nearly shotproof with the guns they then had in use. They next determined to build the Northumberland, the Agincourt, and the Minotaur. They proceeded on what they supposed to be a better target. But, if the target was not so good as that of the Warrior, the Government had made a mistake, and they have made a mistake. After all, did they want an invulnerable ship? They had not quite got it in the Warrior, but it is pretended that they would have it in the target proposed by Mr. Chalmers. It appeared that that target was supposed to be a success; and they heard, also, that it was copied or nearly copied in the Bellerophon. Had it been properly tested with full charges and under the same circumstances as other targets? This is to be doubted. Then there was another target for the Lord Warden. That was the most complicated structure he had ever seen. It was first of iron, then of wood, then of iron, and then of wood again. If that turned out better than the Warrior he should rejoice, but he heard it had been tried and failed. If it had failed, they did wrong to adopt it. The noble Lord would excuse him, however, for saying it had not been very fairly tried. The target actually tried did not represent that portion of the ship it was intended to represent. He wanted to know under what advice our ships were built. Sir R. Seppings made great improvements; Sir William Symonds, it was supposed, had also made improvements. Then came three men who had been brought up in the College of Naval Architecture at Portsmouth, Mr. Crew, Mr. Chatfield, and Mr. Reed—not the Mr. Reed of whom they had heard so much of late. They were admirable men—men of talent. They were employed one day in actual shipbuilding, and another day in scientific studies, thus combining theory with practice. That was a good and sound system for bringing forward practical men. But now the new Naval College was to be conducted on a different system—the students were to spend the six winter months at Kensington, and the other six months in the dockyard. Were they to be employed at the ship's side learning the duties of a shipwright? He was told they were to make drawings at Kensington, but they ought to make drawings from the ships under construction and not from models. He feared the system would turn out a bad one, for though at Kensington they might acquire mathematics in the higher branches and the other elements so much talked of, but which often turned out impractical, they would lose a great deal that was practical. No one stickled more than the noble Lord (Lord C. Paget) for examinations. At the present moment every one raised from one grade to another in the dockyards had to undergo a competitive examination. It was a great pity the noble Lord had not applied that principle to the case of the appointment of Constructor of the Navy. Had he done so, he might, indeed, have got the same man, but the whole country would have been open to him. The selection might have been made from the most eminent private yards, such as that of the Messrs. Laird, of Birkenhead, that of Messrs. Green, that of the Thames Company, and many other establishments. The best practical man would have been got, but instead of that a gentleman was taken out of an office who had not been employed in shipbuilding for ten years. He did not think that that was right. Then, again, was it intended that the able men at present employed in our dockyards should give way to the students at the Kensington school? If so, great heart-burning would be occasioned. First of all, then, they had to determine the question of armour-plating. Then, again, was there sufficient strength in the Admiralty to take up all the great inventions of the day, or did they require more advice? He did not doubt the sea talent of the naval Lord of the Admiralty, or the administrative talent of the hon. Member for Pontefract, who, he had no doubt, would do his work well, but did he pretend to decide what should be the construction of a ship? Had the naval Lords time to turn their attention to the construction of ships? He had heard that the late Controller, a distinguished officer, had said he did not understand shipbuilding. Did the present Controller profess to be able to decide on the lines of a ship? It is believed he did not. They were then in the hands of the new Constructor, and who was his adviser? A connection of his own of very limited knowledge. They wanted as their advisers men of great talent, great energy, and great experience—men who would have the confidence of the country. He feared they had not got them. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, as chairman of Committees, had often to investigate less important matters; were not those of much more importance to be investigated? They could not bring together a sufficient number of Members who had the requisite practical knowledge on this subject, they must therefore look beyond the walls of the House. He had great doubts whether that information could be found even within the walls of the Admiralty. The Warrior carried 20 guns, her tonnage was 300 tons per gun, and her cost was £18,050 per gun. The Defence, which carried 18 guns, or 207 tons per gun, cost £13,373 per gun. The Achilles, of 20 guns, had 306 tons per gun, and cost £16,093 per gun. We ought to have numbers of these ships, and it was of great importance to know that they were being built in the best and cheapest way. Would the noble Lord, therefore, tell the House whether he was aiming at speed, at armament, or at power of resistance? Had the noble Lord entered into the question of constructing ships of steel? Steel was pierced by shot, but it did not splinter, whereas iron splintered, and the splinters were more dangerous than the shot themselves. If it were found impossible to construct at a moderate cost a vessel that would keep out shell and shot, was it worth while to sacrifice speed, and would it not be wiser to let the shot go through if it could not be kept out by any vessel that would go 12 knots an hour? The difference in the construction and cost of these vessels was most remarkable. The Lord Clyde, 24, would have 169 tons per gun, and the cost per gun would be £11,600. The Pallas, 6, would have for each gun 395 tons flotation, and would cost £22,690 per gun. Why were these ships built apparently hap-hazard, the cost per gun being double in some cases to what it was in others? He wanted to know whether, when a ship was ordered to be built, directions were given what her draught of water was to be, her number of guns, her tonnage, and cost per gun. With every respect to guns and soldiers ashore, he looked upon the navy as our main defence, and the way to keep our navy uncrippled was to economize and build at the lowest price and in the most judicious method possible. But how could the difference between these ships be reconciled? The Vizen was to carry four guns, and was to be of 754 tons. The Prince Albert was also to carry four guns, but was to be 2,529 tons. As to the Research, Admiral Fremantle's Report, for which he had moved, would show what the construction of vessels was. He said—

"The space in the battery is so confined that the men have not room to work the guns with that facility that is required. The battery is thirty-three feet in length by thirty-two feet in breadth inside; within this space are four heavy guns, upwards of eighty men, funnel, wheel, hatchway for supplying powder and shell. There is a difficulty in traversing the guns from the broadside to the bow and quarter ports. When the broadside guns were fired with extreme train, foremost ones to the left, after ones to the right, the captains of them could not stand to direct and fire them. These points being of great importance, I have considered it right to bring them before the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty."

He wished to know what was to be done with the Warrior, the Black Prince, and vessels of that kind, which were not plated from bow to stern? If Captain Coles's turrets succeeded, as he hoped and believed, he would suggest whether the spaces in the bow and stern could not be occupied with turrets. These ships were known to be the finest in the world, and they ought to have an armament worthy of their reputation. If his Motion were granted, he was certain that a great saving of public money would follow, and he therefore begged the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Commission to consider the various systems now existing of constructing and Armour-plating Ships of War for the British Navy, as well as for the Navies of other Maritime Powers, and to report what, in the opinion of such Commission, should be the system to be now adopted for the British Navy."—(Sir Frederic Smith.)

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that if he thought the granting of a Commission would have the effect which his hon. and gallant Friend anticipated, he would be the last to object to it. But he thought that the hon. and gallant Gentleman in the course of his able speech had shown that in the first place any Commission that might be appointed would be led into a sea of difficulties, and next, that by the time it had presented its Report, there would have been such alterations and improvements in guns, shot, armour-plating, and all things connected with fighting ships, that it would really be out of date. He had carefully listened to the speech of his hon. and gallant Friend with a view to ascertain whether he could lay down a line for future action. He had told them truly that, of the 27 armour ships we were now constructing, scarcely two, and in no case more than three or four, were of anything like the same dimensions, and he had found fault with the Admiralty for adopting a number of plans.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he did not object to the class of ships that were built, but he did object that those ships did not appear to be performing the duties which those classes of ships should perform. Where there were ships of the same kind there was not the same armament.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, his hon. and gallant Friend seemed to think that, according to tonnage, ships should carry a given number of guns. [Sir FREDERIC SMITH: Yes.] The answer to that was, that although fewer guns might be put on board, yet those guns might be of a heavier calibre, and the Admiralty studied not so much the number of guns as the weight of metal. The hon. and gallant Gentleman stated that the Warrior was built to carry 40 guns, while in fact she only carried 20. The fact was that the Warrior carried more than 20 guns, because she carried a certain number on her upper deck, but it was true also that the guns had been taken away from that part of the main deck of the ship which was not armour-plated. It was, however, also true that the guns which were left on board were of heavier calibre; so that if the number of guns had been diminished the weight of metal fired from those remaining had been increased. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had compared the Warrior with the Gloire; but the fact was that, although the Warrior carried fewer guns than the Gloire, yet she would deliver a heavier broadside in the weight of shot. The great value of guns was the weight of shot they sent. The real object of the Motion appeared to be to find fault with the Research and the Enterprise. [Sir FREDERIC SMITH: No.] The hon. and gallant Gentleman said, why was not a Chief Constructor of the Navy chosen by competition? He (Lord Clarence Paget) was a great advocate of competition, and it had been his desire to apply that system as far as possible, but it had its limits. We did not appoint our high officers by competition. When a man of great talent and knowledge was required, the Government must undertake the responsibility of selecting a man in whom they had confidence. The history of Mr. Reed's appointment was briefly this—Mr. Reed was originally instructed in one of our dock-yards, and he afterwards took a high place among naval architects. That gentleman was employed by the Admiralty to build two vessels, the Research and the Enterprise, and to do what the Constructors of the Navy had hitherto believed to be impossible, to construct armour-plated ships of moderate tonnage. When the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir John Pakington) inquired what sized ship was required to carry armour-plating, he was told that nothing under the size of the Warrior could do it. The Warrior was a great success, no doubt, but there were certain defects connected with that ship, such as her excessive length, and it was thought most desirable if possible to reduce the size. The Admiralty wished to reduce expense and to diminish the draught of water; but they had not been able to get below vessels of 4,000 tons. Mr. Reed proposed to adapt the frames of vessels already in course of construction, and said he could construct a vessel of 1,000 tons to be armour-plated, especially on her vital part near the water line. That was the history of the Research and the Enterprise. The plans of these vessels were sent in, and Mr. Reed was employed to build them. He would not venture to prophesy that the Research and the Enterprise would be found faultless, because in all experiments, such as they were, improvements in matters of detail would always be discovered. He would pass over what had occurred at Devonport, because he held that the Research had not had fair play. The fact of sending her out in a hurry, with her four guns really firing over her decks, exactly as in Captain Coles's ship, was a great novelty, and in his opinion should have been carried out on the first occasion with great care and precautions. The shock did damage to some crockery, and some trifling damage was done to the ship. Those damages, however, were so slight that the Admiral did not report them, but he said the quarters were too confined. It must be borne in mind that those vessels carried men sufficient to full man all their guns, while on other ships there were only sufficient men to man fully one broadside. When the two broadsides were fired one-half of the men were taken from the full number at each gun. In the ships we now possessed the number of men to guns was fewer than in Mr. Reed's vessels. Bearing that fact in mind, it was not surprising that the batteries of these latter vessels should be more crowded; but to make a fair comparison with other ships, one half of the crew should be sent below. There were other defects of detail, such as the funnel and the wheel, which had been remedied. There was, too, the gun slides. He was surprised to hear the hon. and gallant Gentleman ask why they had not adopted Mr. Anderson's slides, when, in fact, these slides had not been invented at the time these vessels were planned. Captain De Horsey, a very intelligent officer, had those two vessels under his orders, and they had been sent singly in order that they might have a satisfactory trial. The hon. and gallant Gentleman said, "Why not send them to the Channel Fleet?" For the same reasons that Captain Coles's vessels were not sent to the Channel Fleet. It was desirable that those new ships should be tried by themselves first. [Sir FREDERIC SMITH: The trial should be public.] They were public, for his hon. and gallant Friend might go aboard if he liked, but the ships were always sent out by themselves in the first instance, just as a racehorse was tried. Captain de Horsey had not been sent to make a favourable report, but to make a faithful one, and he had not known that his report would ever be brought under the notice of that House. He reported on every part of those vessels, and he described them as a success. Having gone through various details, as to their performance under canvas, their wearing and tacking, and their capabilities in running before the wind, and showing that in all respects they were sea-going vessels, he said the accommodation, the stowage, and the ventilation were good, as were the whole internal arrangements of both ships. He said that the ventilation of the Research was not so good as that of the Enterprise, and that the upper deck was too close to the water; and that the fore and aft deck of the sister ship were elevated above the fighting deck, which he thought was a better plan. There was no concealment, for Captain de Horsey observed that the Research was too deep waisted, a fault which the hon. and gallant Gentleman knew was very common in corvettes. Those ships had not been in a gale of wind, but, from a conversation which he had had with the captains, he believed both vessels would be good seafaring ships. Mr. Reed had constructed them, and at a moment when the Admiralty required a Chief Constructor the Duke of Somerset took upon himself to appoint that gentleman. His hon. and gallant Friend said that the Admiralty put their faith in Mr. Reed; but it so happened that there were other constructors of the Navy, very rising men, not to mention Admiral Robinson, who, though not a thorough constructor, was one of the best officers in the navy as regarded an acquaintance with the details of a ship. He wished his hon. and gallant Friend and the public to remember that the mere building of a man-of-war did not represent but half of what was necessary to make her efficient. For equipment, armament, stowage, rigging, magazines, and other points, the judgment and superintendence of a practical sailor were required. His hon. and gallant Friend found fault with the Admiralty because they did not appoint some marvellous man, such as he supposed his hon. and gallant Friend had in his own eye; and another charge brought against them was that they did not inquire sufficiently. Why, several Committees of Inquiry on several different points had been appointed. For the last three or four years they had had a Committee on Armour Plates, presided over by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wakefield (Sir John Hay); and now they were going to have a Committee to inquire into the novel and interesting proposal submitted by Captain Coles for rigging ships on the tripod system to suit the cupolas. They had had many Committees on points of detail, but to appoint a Commission or Committee and tell them they were to construct ships for the navy would be absurd and impossible. His hon. and gallant Friend as the Member for Chatham must know, if he ever visited the dockyards, what the Admiralty were doing with steel, and yet he came to that House and said to the Admiralty, "You are behindhand, and do not use steel." To justify the Admiralty, he would read a letter, dated July 8th, from an independent gentleman, whose authority no one would question—Mr. Fairbairn. The letter was marked "private;" but he was sure that the writer would not object to its being read to the House. At all events, he could not resist reading portions of it. Mr. Fairbairn went into details, which it was unnecessary to bring before the House, though they were most interesting to nautical men; but the following portions of his letter, which was directed to Admiral Robinson, could not fail to be gratifying to every hon. Member:—

"Some days previous to leaving town I visited Chatham along with Mr. Reid for the purpose of examining the iron ship Bellerophon, now in frame at the dockyard. In this inspection I was highly gratified to find that you had adopted what I have all along considered the true principle of construction in the formation of the hull with double bottom, or double sheathing in the cellular form. Longitudinal keelsons united to transverse frames from 3ft. to 4ft. asunder is, in my opinion, the only secure form in which wrought-iron as a material for shipbuilding can be employed; and I have to congratulate you on the prospect of having one of the strongest and lightest ships ever yet constructed for Her Majesty's service. I offer no opinion as to the armour-plating, that is already determined experimentally, and I must leave the lines and form to better and wiser heads than my own. One thing I, however, observed, namely, the capacious breadth of floor at midships, which, I think, is a great improvement."

He thought hon. Gentlemen were too apt to take up newspapers and read some story of the French having advanced beyond us, and of American ships, wonders of the world, which were to completely eclipse anything which we had afloat. He assured the House that as regarded the French he spoke with the greatest respect of their ships, because we owed to those ships many improvements; but he was not at all afraid of our ships; for they were equal if not superior to those of any other nation. He did not deny that their cost was great. They cost perhaps more than they would if constructed in private yards, but he believed they were of superior workmanship, and that their superiority in that respect more than compensated us for the extra cost. He could assure his hon. and gallant Friend that steel shot and the construction of guns were matters not lost sight of by the Admiralty, and that in regard to both we were not behind any other nation. As to the Lord Warden target, it was quite true that target had been roughly handled, but it had not yet been pierced by any gun in use in the service. He did not mean to say that it had not been much shaken.

SIR JOHN HAY: The noble Lord must be speaking of some other target.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: No, he was speaking of the Lord Warden target, which was fired at by the 10·5-inch 12-ton gun, on board the Royal Sovereign—the biggest gun we had got—and which was not pierced by it. It was true that the target had not yet been taken to pieces, and, consequently, the exact amount of damage could not be ascertained. In the Lord Warden and the Lord Clyde we had ships of the very strongest construction. They had the scantling of a line-of-battle-ship, and the only distinction between them and the armour-plated ships built of wood previously was that they had an inner skin of $1\frac{1}{2}$ inch. To call that construction complicated was a misapplication of terms. He would not follow the hon. and gallant Gentleman into the various details of the construction of ships, but he would only say that it was a subject which constantly engaged the attention of the Admiralty, and where they found that any branch of the subject required accurate and detailed information they appointed a committee of practical men. But to throw down on the table instructions to a Commission to construct ships for our navy would be perfectly futile, would lead to vast and extravagant expenditure, and, instead of leading to efficiency, would be a most unfortunate thing for the navy.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that though he did not agree with his hon. and gallant Friend as to the expediency of referring this general subject to a Commission, he did not think that the noble Lord had given reasons which would induce the House to reject the Motion. With regard to the Lord Warden target, the noble Lord and himself must be at cross purposes. If the noble Lord had been present at the experiment, he never could have said that the Lord Warden was not pierced. [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: It was not pierced by the 300-pounder.] He was sorry that he had not the Returns with him, but the noble Lord would see that the target was exposed to a very severe fire, and was not only pierced but destroyed in a most wonderful manner. It was exposed to the fire of four of the heaviest guns in existence. One shell struck it, broke in the target, made a hole four feet in diameter in the front, and eight feet diameter in the rear. The fire was exceedingly heavy, but it was quite possible that our ships might be subjected to such a fire. He quite agreed with his noble Friend that it would be unadvisable to appoint a Committee to go into the general subject of the construction of the navy, but there were points of detail on the subject of construction which might properly be referred to a Committee or Commission. What the public were disposed to find fault with the Admiralty for was, not that they made too many experiments, or that they did not do their duty in endeavouring to ascertain what was the best description of ships, but that their inquiries appeared to be aimless, and that they did not set before them any definite object. There were several points on which a definite decision might be wisely arrived at, and which might be referred to a Committee or Commission. First of all, there was the question of speed. The object of a ship was to be able to carry the best possible guns with the greatest possible speed into the required position, and that the vessel should be capable of being manoeuvred with facility when she was got into that position. The ascertained speed of some ocean-going steamers was from 16 to 17 miles an hour, and it would be desirable to ascertain what speed our men-of-war could reasonably be expected to attain. The speed of a fleet or squadron acting in concert was measured by the speed of the slowest vessel in it, and it would be necessary, therefore, to come to some definite understanding as to what should be the slowest speed given to vessels intended to act in concert. Then, again, there was the question of the draught of large ships. Great disadvantages had arisen from the large draught of some of our large ships, which did not permit them to approach the shore, and which made them unable to enter any of our docks. Another point was the difficulty of turning some of our new long ships with a single screw, and the consequent difficulty of manoeuvring them in action or in a narrow channel. He was not prepared to affirm positively that the twin screw had solved this difficulty, but he believed in his heart that it had. By means of the twin screw the longest ships might be manoeuvred in their own length, and if the Admiralty adopted that principle, he believed they would have solved the difficulty. These were questions which might be wisely referred to a Committee or Commission. He was fully aware of the difficulties the Admiralty laboured under in regard to the question of armament; but he believed we were pausing a little too long over our experiments. This point, at least, had been made pretty clear, that, in a conflict with armour-plated ships, no gun lighter than the 12-ton gun would be of much service. If it could be proved that we could have a 12-ton gun which could be rifled for rifle projectiles, and at the same time used as a smooth-bore gun, let us have a supply of those guns at once sufficient to arm the number of ships we intended to commission, or which we might commission, in the event of a war. There was another point which would require the attention of the Admiralty, and that was, how those new iron ships were to be coppered. His hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Frederic Smith) was not sanguine that that could be done. It should be borne in mind, however, that the ships of Her Majesty's navy must keep the sea for a very long period in time of war, and therefore the question was well deserving the attention of the Admiralty. He was of opinion that when the talent of the country was brought to bear upon it the difficulty might be overcome. There was another subject which had not been alluded to, but which was of deep national importance. We were protecting our ships by iron, and making the hull fireproof; but, after all, the great danger in battle was the danger of fire. Once that we had a certainty that our enemies would be provided with steel shells, we might be equally certain that if the fittings were made of deal the bursting of such a shell would cause not only considerable destruction on board, but even a panic among the crew. Therefore it was necessary that combustible materials should, as far as possible, be got rid of. He had heard with some surprise that after certain trials the Royal Sovereign was about to join the Channel Fleet. But unless the Royal Sovereign was masted, she would hardly be in a condition to be employed as a sea-going ship. They had been asked to give the Royal Sovereign fair play. But what Captain Coles complained of, and what the general public had been led to believe, was that Captain Coles had had not fair play from the Admiralty—that he had not had entire control over the ships which he was to build. Would Captain Coles be satisfied that the Royal Sovereign should be sent to join the Channel Fleet without masts? [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: She has light jury masts.] But not such masts as it would be desirable to send her to sea with. To talk then of sending her to make a trial of her sea-going qualities with the Channel Fleet was, to sea-going men, absurd. As to the Prince Albert, which Captain Coles was building, though it was not for Members of that House to take exception to the number of persons employed upon her, yet he thought everything ought to be done to get her forward, with a view to make a requisite trial. It was hardly judicious to parade before the House the charge that fair play had not been given to the Research and the Enterprise, and to challenge hon. Gentlemen to give fair play to the Royal

Sovereign and the Prince Albert, particularly when the latter vessels had hardly received at the hands of the Admiralty all the consideration to which they were entitled. In the unfortunate Danish war the Rolfe Krake, a ship of the same description, had been tried, and the manner in which her guns had been used, her speed, and the way in which she had manœuvred, were admirable. The experiment in the case of that ship ought to induce us to push forward vessels of the same description, so that we might be able to ascertain what class of ships was best adapted for the public service. His noble Friend had told the House that in the Research the funnel and wheel were matters of detail. But a steamship without a funnel, and any ship at all without a wheel, would not be in a favourable condition for going to sea. Let it be assumed that in action there were forty men below and forty other men with a funnel and wheel in a space about as large as a good-sized dining room. [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: The funnel would be taken away.] Then it would be deprived of the protection to which it was entitled, and so would the wheel. [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: The wheel would be below in action.] He did not think that would be a convenient place for it. However, the Admiralty originally approved of a place about as large as a good-sized dining room for some forty men, a funnel, and a wheel. And besides these they had four large guns in this space requiring forty men to work them, and the ports of the guns were so placed that there was a large space over which the guns could not be trained. Now, an authority whom all would respect, the late Sir Howard Douglas, had laid it down that in no action had any good been done by the guns unless where there was a stable platform, and where the gunners had means of knowing how much or how little the vessel was likely to roll. In Captain Coles's ships the guns would be trained all round the compass, but in the Research the position of the ship must be altered before the guns could be brought to bear, and unless the vessel was in perfectly smooth water an efficient aim could not be taken. The first object should be to make the guns available, and the idea of constructing a ship with such a defect as he had described showed a great want of judgment. Although a good case had been made out for inquiry, he could hardly agree with his hon. and gallant Friend that the whole subject should be handed over to one Commission. There were, however, a few points of detail which were well worthy of the attention of the Admiralty, which might be sent for inquiry to a Committee or a Commission, and which it would be well to have settled as speedily as possible.

MR. LAIRD said, that it was hardly advisable to appoint a Commission, as in naval matters changes were made from day to day. After the large sums of money expended upon the navy, however, the House had a right to ask what position the navy was in if the country were now called upon to go to war. The noble Lord had rightly said it was desirable for the Admiralty to turn their attention to the subject of vessels of light draught of water. If we went to war with Russia, France, or America, we had only two armour-cased vessels—the Research and the Enterprise—that would go at all into shallow water. The Research could only throw a broadside of 170 lb. [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: 220 lb.] He had put a question some time ago with regard to the Enterprise, which was the successful vessel, according to the noble Lord's statement, about the depth of the armour-plating. At the request of the noble Lord he went to the Admiralty to see the plans, and he found that the armour-plating was only one foot above the water. [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: That was a confidential communication.] The Enterprise was a wooden vessel, and he would ask what would be the effect if a shell such as those fired by the Kearsarge were to hit that vessel one foot above the water? They were not to suppose that vessels were always to fight in smooth water. They must take some account of a little swell, and he maintained that as an armour-cased vessel the Enterprise was perfectly useless. The result of sending Captain Coles's ship, the Royal Sovereign, to sea without being properly masted would be in his opinion a total failure. He trusted that the Government, for the sake of the country, would do justice to Captain Coles, and allow that vessel to be masted, so as to make her an efficient sea-going ship. Much had been said of the difficulty of getting effective vessels of a light draught on the cupola system. Now, having paid some attention to this subject, he was prepared to state that vessels of about 1,200 tons could be built with a speed of twelve knots an hour, to carry two of the heaviest guns, two 300-pounders, and throwing a broadside of 600 lb. against the 220 lb. of the Research. Such a vessel could be completely armour-plated, fitted on Captain Coles's plan, masted, rigged, and arranged, so that she should be available not only for harbour and coast defence, but able to go round Cape Horn or any other part of the world. He did not profess much knowledge of gunnery, but he believed that the only method of carrying the heavy guns now proposed was on the plan of Captain Coles, because the guns could be trained in the simplest and easiest manner, and worked with fewer hands than in any other ships. He trusted that the Admiralty would consider the subject, because if they would use all possible appliances for working the yards, rigging, and guns of their ships, they would require fewer men to man the navy, and might then reduce the Navy Estimates. The Admiralty would also, he hoped, give their attention to vessels of a smaller class. The cost would not be great, and if they were to go to war to-morrow they would have suddenly to apply all the resources of the dockyards and private yards to provide themselves with vessels of light draught, capable of going across the Atlantic or to cross the Channel, in order to compete with what on the other side of the Atlantic were called turret vessels. But if the Admiralty were to send such vessels as composed their African squadron—if they sent out slow, wooden vessels—they would meet with the fate that befell the Alabama. [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: Those vessels go to the bottom, too, sometimes.] He was not alluding to regular sea-going vessels, but if we went to war we must not wait to be attacked, but must have the means of attacking the enemy on his coast. He challenged the noble Lord to contradict his statement that this country was in a very unsafe condition in that respect. On the rivers of France there were floating batteries of great power and slow speed, which were more than a match for any vessels we could send out, except vessels like the Warrior, which would not float in shallow waters. To make our fleet efficient in this way would not cost a large sum. The Admiralty could not assert that it was enough to have two experimental vessels of wood merely cased to the water-line. The Admiralty would have to do what they had been urged for years to do—namely, to follow private enterprise, and construct our navy entirely of iron.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he did not think a Commission would be useful. The only way of meeting the difficulty of the case was the reconstruction of the Board of Admiralty itself. He did not dispute the talent of Mr. Reed, the present chief constructor of the navy, but it was not right and proper that the Admiralty should be guided by one mind. The constructor should design the vessels, and submit those designs to practical men, so that any defects, such as were discovered in the Research, might be found out before the ships were constructed. That was done in other countries, and practically we had simply adopted what had been initiated in other countries. The great problem to be solved was how the greatest force could be most judiciously employed. As the Admiralty was at present constructed it could not, he believed, deal with that problem; they were too much in the hands of a single individual.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the question which had been raised was of the highest importance, but he was sorry that he was obliged so far to differ from his hon. and gallant Friend that he could not be any party to recommending Her Majesty's Government to appoint such a Commission as he had recommended. He was opposed to the appointment of a Commission, both because he would not be a party to any step which would relieve from its proper responsibility the department of the State to which Parliament had intrusted the management of our naval affairs, and also because he felt the unanswerable force of the argument that we were in a state of transition with regard to the subject, that new inventions were being brought forward every day, and when the Commission had made their Report they would probably find that something had been devised which would entirely supersede their recommendation. The only safe course was to leave matters to the responsibility of the Admiralty, in which he was sure that his noble Friend would admit that Parliament had of late years placed great confidence. He had always expressed the opinion that the Admiralty were right in trying any experiments or adopting any course which had a reasonable prospect of success. All that was desired was that they should to the best of their ability adopt all the improvements which might be devised in regard to the armour-plating of ships. He was afraid that on some occasions they had not carried out their experiments with all the caution that was desirable. He referred especially to the manner in which they had dealt with Captain Coles's invention of cupola ships. It was a great mistake to cut down the Royal Sovereign instead of building an entirely new vessel. Perhaps, however, there could hardly be a more striking illustration of the change which was now taking place than was to be found in the fact, that there was good reason to believe that the Royal Sovereign, reduced in size and carrying five guns, was a more valuable and effective ship than before she was cut down, and when she carried 130 guns. His noble Friend had spoken of her joining the Channel Fleet.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET explained that he did not mean that the Royal Sovereign was to be considered as a sea-going ship, but only that she was to be placed under the orders of Admiral Dacres, who commanded the Channel Fleet. She would be a coasting ship.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that that showed the mistake which had been made. Although the Royal Sovereign was intended for harbour purposes she drew 27 feet of water. He did not intend to cast any censure upon Mr. Reed, who deserved the credit of having first tried the experiment of applying armour-plating to small vessels, but he could not help contrasting the Research with the Rolfe Krake. These two vessels were as nearly as possible of the same size, tonnage, and armoury. They each carried four guns, but while the Rolfe Krake could use them all on either side, the Research could only fire two on each side; and while the Rolfe Krake drew only 10 feet of water, the Research drew 15. There could be no question as to the superiority of the vessel built in the Clyde by Messrs. Napier to that built for the Admiralty by Mr. Reed. He thought that the Admiralty had made a great mistake in the style of rigging which they had adopted for our larger class of armour-covered vessels, such as the Defence and the Hector. He did not lay much stress upon the fact that the rig of those vessels was so unsightly that it seemed as if the Admiralty had exercised their ingenuity to see how ugly a man-of-war could be made; but he was told that the masts and yards of these vessels were so deficient in size and power that they could not go to sea under canvas. That was a great misfortune, both because in the case of any accident to their machinery they would become helpless, and because the system of compelling vessels always to steam was a most expensive and extravagant one.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the French ships spread less canvas than those of the rig of which the right hon. Baronet was complaining.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that he was dealing with this as a positive question, and not as a matter of comparison. His complaint was that these vessels would not be effective under canvas. The House had a right to expect that the Admiralty should call to their aid all the greatest talent that they could command, should devote every care to the consideration of this subject, and should boldly and freely try any experiment which held out a reasonable prospect of success. If they would persevere in that course, it would be better to leave these questions to their responsibility, and not to incur them with inquiries or commissions which could lead to no practical good.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH, in withdrawing his Motion, said that the discussion which had taken place had been a useful one, and he, therefore, trusted that the House would not blame him for having introduced the subject.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

POOR RELIEF (METROPOLIS) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS, in rising to move for leave to bring in a Bill to make provision for distributing the charge of relief of certain classes of poor persons over the metropolis, said, he simply sought by the measure to give effect to the recommendations of a Committee which had arrived at an unanimous conclusion on the subject. The House was familiar with the accounts which so frequently appeared of the wandering poor who paraded the streets of the metropolis at night, and who were sometimes unable to obtain the relief which the law provided, and the Committee inquired very closely into the liability of the parishes to contribute to their support. Upon investigation it seemed that the present law failed in the respect that there was an unfair distribution of charges throughout the several Unions, while there was no doubt of the liability of the various parishes to support the destitute. After much inquiry the Committee came to the conclusion that the evil arose from the unequal distribution of the charge, and they recommended that some common fund should be created for the maintenance of that class of poor. They considered that the machinery of the Metropolitan Board of Works might be made available for the purpose, while under the machinery of the Poor Law Board there would be every check against abuse. The Bill provided for the creation of the necessary fund, which would only amount to £5,000 for the whole metropolis, while the property, on which the Metropolitan Board made their rate, amounted to £13,600,000. He believed that all the Unions in the metropolis agreed to the Bill, and that the Metropolitan Board did not object to it.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to make provision for distributing the charge of the Relief of certain classes of Poor Persons over the whole of the Metropolis, ordered to be brought in by Mr. VILLIERS and Mr. GILPIN.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 224.]

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. MASSEY, Bill to apply a sum, out of the Consolidated Fund and the Surplus of Ways and Means, to the Service of the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four, and to appropriate the Supplies granted in this Session of Parliament, ordered * to be brought in by Mr. MASSEY, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. PEEL.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS BILL.

On Motion of Sir FITZ ROY KELLY, Bill for the more effectual prevention of Bribery and Corruption in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, ordered * to be brought in by Sir FITZ ROY KELLY, Sir JOHN PAKINGTON, and Mr. WHITESIDE.

STAMP DUTIES ACT (1864) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Bill to amend an Act of the present Session, chapter eighteen, as to the Stamp Duties on certain Letters or Powers of Attorney, ordered * to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and Mr. PEEL.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 225.]

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that it was with great regret he rose to announce that he felt compelled to abandon the Bill for that Session. There was a proposition lying at the root of this all-important question, and worthy of the consideration of those who were opposed to the Bill, and that proposition was that every man in the country had a right to demand of the Government under which he lived that, before he should be deprived by the irresistible power of the State of his life or liberty, all practical means at least should be exhausted to ascertain whether he was guilty or innocent of the crime with which he was charged. So long as there was no effectual appeal in criminal cases that right was virtually denied to the subjects of this country. For want of such a court of appeal an intolerable evil had arisen in the practice which had grown up in the office of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Under the name of the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, the office of the Home Secretary had become of late years merely and simply a court of criminal appeal without any of the qualities and powers which belonged to a court of justice. The result was, that the greatest possible dissatisfaction at the decisions of the Home Office in these matters had been excited, for no one could tell whether those decisions had been correctly arrived at. Various accidental circumstances had from time to time prevented his proceeding with the present Bill, and he had been disappointed in mitigating the serious opposition which existed to it in certain quarters. Though he believed that he had the authority of the greater number of the Judges in Westminster Hall in favour of the measure, yet he feared that the Government were opposed to it both in principle and detail, and, consequently, he felt that at that period of the Session it would be a waste of public time were he to enter at large into the question. He moved, therefore, that the order of the day for the second reading of the Bill should be discharged, giving notice at the same time that at the commencement of next Session he would submit to the consideration of the House a similar measure.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL observed that had the discussion come on, he would have been prepared to show that there were grave objections to the Bill, and that the measure could not be adopted without great inconvenience.

Order discharged: Bill withdrawn.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COLLINS said, he rose to move the second reading of the Bill, which had come down from the House of Lords. The object of it was to legalise what now took place without law — namely, the holding of divine worship in collegiate schools. Eton, Winchester, and other large schools had their own private chapels, to which the students resorted; and it was considered advisable to give the boys of other schools the advantage of Divine worship in the same way, as there was not really proper accommodation for them in many of the churches belonging to the particular parishes in which those schools were situated. It might be said that it would materially interfere with the parochial system, but surely that was absurd. Take the cases, for example, of Rugby or of Harrow. Surely it could not be considered that the boys in those schools were parishioners of either Rugby or Harrow, when it was well known they came from all parts of the kingdom? If the Bill were passed those schools would become to a certain extent separate parishes, and the cure of souls would be assigned to the school-master of each school, with, of course, the assent of the Bishop. Any apprehensions lest an objectionable form of worship should be introduced into those collegiate chapels, would be found untenable when it was recollected that no school could thrive in which the religious teaching was not to a certain extent in accordance with the views of the parents of the pupils. The parents of the boys would therefore, he considered, have a greater control over the character of the Divine service in those schools than they had at present over the services performed in the parish churches. Such sermons as Dr. Arnold delivered at Rugby and Dr. Vaughan at Harrow were surely more appropriate and beneficial for an audience of boys than those which were usually addressed to mixed congregations, and it was desirable that every facility should be afforded for such services. The Bill was carefully worded, and only applied to schools incorporated by Act of Parliament or by charter, where the religious service was required to be in accordance with the doctrines of the Church of England. By a clause in the Bill it was provided that no persons except residents or persons connected with the college should have power to enter those chapels. If the words were not stringent enough he would be ready in Committee to make any Amendment which would provide that the parochial system should not be interfered with, except so far as those who were legitimately connected with the college were concerned. After all, the parochial system was not the essence of religion, and he was at a loss to know how any objections could be raised against the Bill upon that score. He trusted that the House would assent to the principle of the measure by agreeing to the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Collins.)

MR. HARDCASTLE said, he should move that the Bill be read a second time that day month. He looked upon the Bill as one introducing an innovation in respect to religious service in collegiate schools all over the country, which was highly objectionable. The hon. Member had spoken of the Bill being applicable to Harrow and Rugby, but if he looked to the interpretation clause he would find that neither Harrow nor Rugby would be affected by the Bill, inasmuch as neither of these schools was incorporated by charter or Act of Parliament — they were private foundations. He believed the real object of the Bill was to enable the masters of the schools known as King Edward Schools to conduct service morning and evening without the presence of the parents, and to administer the Communion without the control of the clergyman of the parish, and so that the parents of the children should have no control over the religious instruction imparted to them. Now, these schools were really established for towns, and not for scholars who were drawn from a distance by the reputation of the head master. At present the children of Dissenters attending these schools were only required to attend church once a day, and the parents might attend, and if any improper instruction were given them they could have it rectified; but if the Bill passed the parents could no longer be present at the service, as one of the provisions was that none but the boys should be present, and thus Dissenters would be practically excluded from the schools. He did not mean to say that under certain circumstances there should not be private chapels in connection with some of the large schools, but a measure to provide such chapels required great consideration, and ought not to be introduced at the close of the Session, when there was not time to fully discuss it.

Mr. KINNAIRD seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day month."—(Mr. Hardeastle.)

Mr. REMINGTON MILLS said, that the real object of the Bill was very artfully concealed, so as to give it quite a plausible appearance. It would extend to all the grammar schools throughout the country, and would have the effect of compelling pupils to attend the services of the Church of England, even though they were not boarders, but lived with their parents. A new principle was thus introduced into education, and the rights, duties, and responsibility of parents were invaded. Wherever it was possible children ought to attend worship with their parents, and the domestic relations ought to be especially preserved in these sacred matters. Another objection to the Bill was, that it limited the choice of the managers of a school in the appointment of a master, as he must be a man in priest's orders; and, on the other hand, it imposed a new duty on the master which might prevent him from accepting clerical engagements elsewhere. That was an exceedingly inopportune time for bringing forward such a measure, for a Commission was talked of in regard to these schools, and this would naturally form one of the subjects of inquiry. The measure was quite uncalled for, and would do a great deal of harm. It would shut out Dissenters from the schools, give those institutions a narrow sectarian character, and create unhappy associations in the minds of boys between the school where perhaps they had been flogged, and the church in which they worshipped. The Bishops did not want the control that was to be given them by the Bill, and he considered the Bill, if carried, would have an injurious effect upon the schools by excluding large numbers who would not submit to it.

Mr. KINNAIRD said, he should also support the Amendment. He protested against the practice of bringing in measures of such importance as the present at the close of the Session, when there was no time to consider them properly, and hurrying them through without proper explanation. He held that the Government ought to protect independent Members against such proceedings. He deprecated exceedingly the multiplication of religious services in schools. He could say from his own experience that the compulsory attendance of boys at frequent services had a tendency to create a distaste for religious matters. Boys were hurried to church every saint's day and holiday, and were thus led to regard attendance at service as an infliction from which they were glad to escape. At present the masters and tutors had sufficient means of instructing those under their charge in strict religious principles. The Bill would interfere not with the large schools so much as with the grammar schools throughout the country, and would create a prejudice against the Established Church. He thought it was a wholesome and proper custom that children should accompany their parents to church. A notice had been put on the paper on behalf of the Government, which showed that they deemed it necessary that some protection should be given to the Nonconformists; but the Amendment proposed was not sufficient for the purpose. He trusted the House would not agree to so mischievous a measure.

Mr. NEATE said, he objected to the Bill. It would have the effect of fastening on many of the schools a more exclusive connection with the Established Church than they now possessed. Great difficulty would arise in working the act in the giving a definition to what schools it was to apply, the schools described being those "incorporated by Her Majesty for the purpose of instruction in religious and useful learning in accordance with the Church of England." He concurred that the multiplication of these chapels would tend to abuse the religious feeling of the people. He would give an instance of the evil effect of the present system on boys, and that evil effect would no doubt increase if the Bill passed. A boy on leaving one of the public schools, took off his hat, and addressing the chapel, said—"Good bye. I have been in you often enough. I'll take care I don't attend another." He thought the daily prayers should be shortened, rather than increased.

Mr. F. S. POWELL said, that a sort of phantom fear possessed hon. Gentlemen opposite in regard to this measure. The spirit of the hon. Member for Peterborough seemed to pervade them, and to inspire them with a vague fear of the "Pope being at the bottom of it." The initiative in regard to the services contemplated by the Bill was to be taken not by the masters but by the governing bodies of the schools. He was not aware of any intention to hold morning and evening services in the school chapels, and believed that the apprehensions on that score were groundless. It would not be an injury to the head-masters to call on them to preach to the boys. On the contrary, it would be a benefit to them to be able to combine the ordinary work of tuition with the discharge of clerical functions. It would also be an advantage to the boys and would improve the general tone of the schools. He deprecated as much as any one the separation of boys from their families in religious worship, but he did not see that it was necessarily involved in the working of the Bill. At any rate, he was sure that if any strong feeling on the subject were expressed by the parents, it would be respected. It had already been sufficiently provided by the Act which was passed some time since, that the children of Nonconformist parents should be exempt from religious instruction in grammar schools, and therefore the argument that the Bill would exclude Dissenters from these schools failed. He had no doubt that in Committee there would be a disposition to include the large schools as well as the others. To the third and fourth clauses he objected, as they were an unjustifiable interference with the authority of the rector and churchwardens.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he concurred in a great deal that had been said by his hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) as to the inconvenience of Bills of such importance coming down from the other House so late in the Session. The measure had created considerable, although he believed exaggerated alarm among the Nonconformist members of the community, and more time should be allowed for its consideration. Looking to the importance of the principle, to the nature of some of the details, and to the strong objections urged even by the supporters of the Bill to part of it, he thought that it should be sent to a Select Committee, and, on that understanding, would have been willing to vote for the second reading. It was not at all clear from the second clause what schools were included in the Bill; and alarm was caused by the supposition that it would comprehend all the smaller as well as the great grammar schools throughout the country. By the foundation of most of these schools they were intended to afford religious instruction according to the Church of England; but as day pupils, if not as boarders, the children of Nonconformists attended. Now, if the effect of the Bill would be to compel the attendance of all pupils at the services of the Church of England, that was a measure which the House, he was sure, would not be prepared to sanction. It would be right in any case to limit the operation of the Bill to boarders and perhaps also to schools with not less than a certain number of scholars. It would be very inconvenient to have every small grammar school setting up a chapel of its own. Nothing was said in the Bill about daily services, but they might be established under it, and the service could not be abridged. Under these circumstances, and considering the period of the Session, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press the Bill that year.

MR. COLLINS said, he felt that, under the circumstances, he had no resource but to withdraw the Bill for the Session.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Second Reading put off till this day fortnight.

TITLES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. MONSELL, Bill to provide more certain and economic means for transferring and otherwise dealing with certain Lands in Ireland, *ordered to be brought in by Mr. MONSELL, Mr. HERBERT, and Sir COLMAN O'LOUGHLIN.

CUBA SLAVE TRADE.

GENERAL DULCE.—EXPLANATION.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he had received a letter from his noble Friend, Lord Howden, complaining that when, in the observations he made the other evening in reference to the Cuba slave trade, he accused the Spanish Governors of Cuba generally of having taken bribes and encouraged the slave trade, he made no exception of General Dulce. The fact was, however, that he did state on the occasion referred to, that General Dulce formed an exception, and ten days before, in contrasting the conduct of the Government of Spain with that of Brazil, he bore testimony in favour of General Dulce, and the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary had also commended General Dulce's conduct. But praise did not penetrate the walls of that House as vituperation did, and the reason was that the former did not bear the same price in the market. If all the Spanish Governors had been but half as good as General Dulce, the slave trade would now be probably at an end. Lord Howden had expressed a strong opinion that the Aberdeen Act ought no longer to be maintained, because the Brazilians had entirely abolished the slave trade. Lord Aberdeen himself in 1856 declared that either in the event of the slave trade ceasing, or the Convention being renewed, he would be disposed to move for the repeal of that Act. Though not liable to the charge of having neglected to praise General Dulce, he had made an omission of which the Jamaica petitioners complained, and that was that he had not given Admiral Hope the credit so justly due to him. Admiral Hope was a gallant officer who had in every respect performed his duty with respect to the Cuban slave trade, and had also distinguished himself in the East. It was with the greatest pleasure that he bore testimony to his merits, as he was the son of a revered friend, the late President of the Court of Session in Scotland.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (METRIC SYSTEM) BILL.

(No. 164.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL FORTESCUE, having presented a petition in favour of this Bill from the Association of Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom, said, that the question of weights and measures had an hereditary claim upon his support, because he whose place he so unworthily filled succeeded in carrying through the other House of Parliament many years ago a measure establishing the system of weights and measures now the law of the land. After twenty years' experience of the working of the present system, however, his late father was so convinced of the superiority of the metric system that he was one of the first to give his adhesion to the introduction, in a permissive shape, of the metric system in this country. The former Act was introduced in pursuance of the recommendations of a Select Committee, and the present Bill was equally the result of the unanimous recommendation of a Committee of the other House composed of men of all parties. It was unnecessary to remark that the present being a permissive Bill must necessarily remain a dead letter unless it were adopted by the free will of the people; but that it would be freely adopted by all persons engaged in trade, manufactures, and science, he had not the least doubt—in fact, the petition from the Associated Chambers of Commerce, which he had just presented, seemed to place the matter beyond doubt, as the petitioners might be fairly considered as representing the feelings of all practical men in the important towns they represented. Their Lordships must be fully aware of the variety of the measures of grain, wine, and beer which prevailed in different parts of the country. In some countries a bushel of wheat was 60 lbs., in some 64 lbs., in others 70 lbs.; sometimes it was sold by weight, sometimes by measure; the mode of measuring distances varied—in short, nothing could be more confused than the present system. The adoption of the metric system would cure this want of uniformity, and would substitute for that which was inconvenient and difficult to learn a system which was simple and easy to be acquired. The adoption of this system would save half the time which was at present occupied in making calculations. The very strongest evidence had been given in its favour by practical men. Among those who recommended its introduction, and some of whom employed it in the transaction of their own business, were the late Mr. Locke, the eminent engineer, who, having found the metric system in one of his foreign contracts so advantageous, that he adopted it for the transaction of his business in England; Mr. Whitworth, Mr. Robinson of the Atlas Works, Mr. Crossley, Mr. Anderson superintendent of the gun factory at Woolwich, Sir Rowland Hill, and Professor Graham the Master of the Mint. Scientific men were equally favourable to the metric system. The Jurors at the International Exhibitions of London and Paris said, that a great part of the benefit which might have arisen from the exhibition of the raw produce and manufactures of various countries was lost to thousands of persons in consequence of the difficulty of comparing the weights and measures and the moneys of one country with those of another. Professor Hoffman and Professor Owen, in their reports as Jurors of the Exhibition of 1862, referred to the confusion and discord which existed in the systems of weights and measures of different countries. The fact was that this confusion was so great, and so much time and labour were consumed in converting the weights and measures of one country into their equivalents in a foreign system, that practically the knowledge of one nation was a sealed book to the scientific men of others. As to the facility with which the system could be learnt there was the most conclusive testimony, and Professor Leone Levi summed up its general result to be that a boy could make the same progress in arithmetic taught according to the metric system in ten months as would according to the existing method take him two years and ten months to accomplish. Considering the value of youthful labour and the short time which could be spared to education by the children of the poor, this was a matter of some importance. He entreated their Lordships not to take any step which would impose upon these children two years of useless labour, and not to aid in preventing the free interchange of the manufactures and commodities as well as of the knowledge and information of all the people of the world. The noble Lord concluded by moving that the Bill should be read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(Earl Fortescue.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY admitted that there was a good deal of confusion attached to our present system of weights and measures, but desired to point out that, notwithstanding the pound had become the uniform measure by which all things were sold, and that to introduce the metric system would be only to add another element of confusion. He would ask their Lordships whether, at this period of the Session, and, as a consequence, without due time for its discussion, it was desirable to pass a measure whose operation would be to create confusion in every market town in England? Believing that it was not, he should move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Six Months").—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he thought the Government would not allow the Bill to pass through their Lordships' House without expressing some opinion as to its proposal. If this country had passed through such a crisis as France passed in 1789 it might not be disadvantageous to introduce the metric system; but under existing circumstances, it not being proposed to abolish the present system, but only to allow the introduction of the new system pari passu with the old, he thought the confusion would be augmented rather than diminished. Nothing, he would add, but compulsory legislation would induce the people of this or any other country to give up the system to which they were accustomed in favour of one even more scientific and simple.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, speaking solely for himself, said that he had heard no valid argument urged against the Bill, and should vote in its favour. The fact, he contended, that almost all the Chambers of Commerce throughout the country supported it by their petitions was one of great importance for the consideration of the House, for it afforded a strong proof that many persons in the mercantile world were of opinion that to them, at least, the system would be advantageous. It was said that the operation of the Bill would be to add to the existing confusion; but it was, in his opinion, impossible to do that, at all events so far as Scotland was concerned. There were "bolls" and "bushels," varying in capacity, in almost every county in Scotland. He did not suppose that the habits of the people in various localities could be very easily altered in dealing with the local system of measures; but the proposed change would, he thought, be very generally adopted in the case of large mercantile transactions, particularly those transactions with foreign countries which were so greatly on the increase. It could only be used where both parties to a contract consented; they would only use it if they thought it convenient. It was not compulsory on any one, and therefore could do no one harm; but by allowing its use the effect might be that ultimately it would elbow out the present confused and defective system. The Bill, at all events, could do no harm, and he saw no good reason why their Lordships should not adopt it.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY supported the Bill, remarking that if men largely engaged in commerce wished for it, he saw no reason why the House should stand in the way of its passing.

LORD BROUGHAM regarded the Bill as an important step in the right direction, and he hoped to live to see the decimal system in general use. He was, he might add, an advocate of the change not only in a commercial but in an educational point of view, and he had the testimony of Mr. Chadwick, to whose efforts the half-time system—one of the greatest improvements of our day—was due, to the effect that the introduction of the decimal system would shorten the time occupied in the teaching of arithmetic by one-half.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, it was a mistake to suppose that noble Lords on that side of the House were averse to the metric system as such. What they objected to was that a Bill of this importance should be introduced at that late period of the Session. Either the Government ought to take it up and pass it on their own responsibility, or there ought to be a Select Committee next Session to take the Bill into careful consideration. The argument that the Bill was only permissive was very much against it, for if it were right that all the weights and measures in the country should be equalized, it must be by a compulsory measure. A mere permissive Bill only added another element to the confusion.

EARL FORTESCUE, in reply, said, that in all the countries in which the system had been introduced, its simplicity had caused it to work without any friction or opposition.

On Question that ("now") stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided:—Contents 34; Not-Contents 23: Majority 11.

Resolved in the Affirmative: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

POISONED FLESH PROHIBITION, &c.,
BILL—(No. 212.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD REDESDALE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that it had frequently happened that valuable animals, the property of other persons, had been destroyed by eating poisoned meat laid for the destruction of vermin; and this evil the Bill was intended to remedy. The principle of the measure was precisely the same as was sanctioned by Parliament last year in reference to poisoned grain.

—(Lord Redesdale.)

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that the second clause imposed a penalty of £10 for placing poisoned meat or other matter upon any land; and the consequence would be that the owner of any house or stack could not place poison, even in his own garden, for the destruction of rats, without incurring a penalty. It would be for their Lordships to consider whether the clause should not be modified.

LORD CHELMSFORD observed that by an exception in the first clause, an owner or occupier of land in Ireland could not place poisoned matter upon the land without first posting a notice that such was done; but he (Lord Chelmsford) could not understand how this notice would prevent dogs eating the poisoned meat.

LORD REDESDALE said, that he was not responsible for the details, for the measure had been altered in the Commons; and their Lordships knew that in the other House exceptions with reference to Ireland were often inserted in measures which were under consideration. If the Bill were now read a second time the details could be considered in Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH thought that the exception practically excepted Ireland from the operation of the Bill, and in his opinion it was very desirable that England should be excepted also.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY thought it hardly desirable to proceed further with the Bill this Session.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH thought that the putting of poisonous substances upon land by gamekeepers for the destruction of vermin was a great and growing evil; and in the south of Scotland he could state of his own knowledge that where strychnine had been used valuable shepherds' dogs had been killed by eating the poisoned vermin.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he also knew that dogs and pigs were frequently poisoned, and pheasants likewise were destroyed. It was a curious and well-known fact in natural history, that though the maggots generated in the poisoned carcases were not affected by the poison, yet they communicated the destructive effects to birds that eat them. Every reason which applied to putting poisoned grain upon land applied also to the placing of poisoned meat there.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he was certainly not in favour of laying poison for small birds, which, so far from being noxious, were extremely useful. If he could prevent the poisoning of foxes, and at the same time allow the poisoning of vermin, he would do so; but this Bill would prevent the latter, and would thus occasion serious inconvenience and injury. This was not a fox-preserving question on the one side and a game-preserving question on the other. It should be looked at as neither of those questions; but, believing that the Bill would be productive of mischief on the whole, he moved that it be read a second time this day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Three Months").—(Lord Wodehouse.)

LORD PORTMAN hoped their Lordships would not reject this Bill on the second reading. Many of the points to which objection had been made could be amended in Committee. He was sure that if in the Bill for prohibiting poisoned grain which passed last year a clause had been introduced to prohibit poisoned flesh it also would have been passed. Some noble Lords were most anxious to destroy the birds and others to destroy the animals. He knew that it was a practice of keepers to poison rabbits with strychnine, and place them in preserves to poison vermin. Now, if one of these rabbits should be picked up by any passer-by and eaten, the consequences might be deplorable.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 31; Not-Contents 18: Majority 13.

Resolved in the Affirmative: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

NAVY—PAYMENT OF OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. C. P. BERKELEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he considers that the officers of long standing and high rank in the Navy are satisfied with the recent distribution of pay, as lately gazetted, by which it appears that their juniors will receive more than themselves; and if he considers that the fact of officers receiving more on the Retired Lists than those who remain on the Active Lists, will act beneficially in inducing officers to seek service; and if, considering the anomalies which have arisen in the various rates of pay, half-pay, retired pay, and reserve pay, Her Majesty's Government will cause any inquiry to be made, either by Royal Commission or otherwise?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, he had heard of no complaints to the effect that the officers of the navy were dissatisfied with the distribution of pay as recently gazetted. With regard to the junior officers receiving more pay than their seniors, that was undoubtedly true, but he had to observe that that was the only way in which officers could be induced to retire from the service, and make room for others more active. That arrangement was, therefore, inseparable from all schemes for retirement. His hon. Friend also asked whether he considered that the scheme would act beneficially in inducing officers to seek service; and he (Lord Clarence Paget) had to reply that he was not aware of the existence of any reluctance on the part of officers to seek service. On the contrary, there were repeated applications from officers for active employment. With respect to the latter part of the Question of his hon. Friend, he had to state that Her Majesty's Government had given great consideration to that subject, and that they were not at present disposed to cause any inquiry to be made, by Commission or otherwise, into the various rates of pay in the navy.

MR. C. P. BERKELEY said, he would give notice that he should call attention to the subject at the earliest opportunity.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN STATE PAPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether a publication, called The British and Foreign State Papers, issued annually, and edited by the Librarian of the Foreign Office, is printed either wholly or in part at the public expense; and if so, whether such a selection might not be distributed to Members at the ordinary price of Parliamentary Papers instead of being charged 30s. a volume; and whether it might not be brought up to the present time like the French collection?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that The British and Foreign State Papers were printed at the expense of the public, and sold at a certain rate, the proceeds passing to the public account. As to the distribution of the publication at the ordinary price of Parliamentary Papers, there was, of course, no objection to that if the House were willing to incur the expense. As to the work being brought down to the present time, that was impossible. The French publication referred to was of a different nature. It was a collection, hastily brought together, of documents published in various ways on the Continent. The State Papers, on the other hand, which were published by the British Foreign Office, were very carefully edited. They could not be brought down to the present day, because many of the papers were not printed till four or five years after they had been made use of. Some years ago the collection was very much behindhand. The present Librarian of the Foreign Office, however, who was a gentleman of great intelligence and zeal, had published two volumes a year, and was anxious, if possible, to increase the annual issue to three volumes. The work required so much care and attention that it was not desirable to undertake more than two or three volumes a year. By 1867 or 1868, he believed the collection would be brought up to within five years.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, that as far as he was aware they were not secret papers.

CONVICTION FOR SALE OF DISEASED MEAT.—QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD said it appeared from the Report of the Sanitary Committee of the City of London that in the twelve months ending September, 1863, not less than 114,000 lbs. of diseased, and 76,000 lbs. of putrid meat, were seized and condemned in the City of London. He therefore would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Alexander Stewart, who was convicted at the Central Criminal Court in December, 1863, of the offence of sending diseased meat from Scotland to London for sale, and sentenced to the payment of a fine of £50, and imprisonment for the term of twelve calendar months, has been liberated from gaol without payment of the fine; and, if so, that he will state the grounds on which Stewart was so liberated and the fine remitted; and whether applications are not now before the Secretary of State for the Home Department for the remission of punishments and penalties in other similar cases.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I find, Sir, that Alexander Stewart, the person referred to, was convicted in November, 1863, for exposing for sale meat unfit for food. An application was made for a mitigation of the sentence, which was refused. But at the end of May, when he had undergone six months of the sentence, the Visiting Justices of Holloway Prison recommended his discharge on medical grounds, sending a certificate from the surgeon stating that his life was in great danger, and that unless soon liberated he would die; upon which he was discharged. The only other case of a similar kind in which, so far as I can ascertain, any application has been made is that of a man named George Thompson Smith, sentenced in March last to six months' imprisonment, and that application has been refused.

RESERVOIRS.—QUESTION.

MR. FERRAND said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is an illegal act for the owners of a hill reservoir to fill it with water, and keep it full, or nearly full, for several successive weeks, without having had it duly certified by two Magistrates; if so (the Secretary of State having declared that he has no official authority to interfere), whether it would be an illegal act for the inhabitants whose lives are in danger to resist the filling of the reservoir until duly certified, for the purpose of securing their self-preservation, and their homes from destruction?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, there is no general law to the effect stated by the hon. Gentleman, and I am not aware that in any case it is necessary to obtain the certificate of two magistrates before a reservoir is filled. But there is a clause in some Private Acts authorizing the construction of water works (and it is in the Bradford Waterworks Act), by which, on a representation being made to two justices by the owners or occupiers of any premises liable to be injured, that the embankment of the reservoir is in a dangerous state, such justices, if satisfied on an inquiry of the truth of such representation, shall require the Company within a given time to repair it. And the Act empowers the magistrates to take certain steps in the event of the Company not complying with the order. In this case, therefore, the law has provided an effectual remedy against danger. In answer to the latter part of the question of the hon. Gentleman, I can only say that I should advise him, or those who apprehend danger, to avail themselves of the provisions of the law, instead of taking the law into their own hands.

MR. FERRAND said, he wished to know whether there was any power to make the magistrates act?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the words of the clause were, not that the "magistrates may," but that "the magistrates shall" do such and such things. The Court of Queen's Bench would deal with the magistrates if they wilfully neglected their duty.

WINE LICENCES.—QUESTION.

MR. COX said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the injustice done by five Magistrates of the county of Middlesex, sitting in Special Sessions, to a Mr. Weston, not only in refusing him a "Gladstone" Wine Licence for the Retreat Tea Gardens at Kentish Town, but also in refusing to give the grounds of their objections when called on so to do by the Counsel of Mr. Weston, to enable him to appeal to Quarter Sessions; and whether he will bring in a Bill next Session making it compulsory on Magistrates refusing applications for such Licences to state their reasons for refusing to grant the same?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, a short statement of this case was placed in my hands a few days ago by the hon. Gentleman. I can only state in answer to his question, what the law as to granting Wine Licences is. By the Act of 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 27, s. 13), on an application for a Wine Licence for the first time being made to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, the Supervisor of Excise for the district is required to send notice of the application to the Justices of the Petty Sessions, stating that the licence will be granted after thirty days, unless the justices send a written notice that they object to its being granted on some or one of the grounds specified in the Act. It is further provided that no such objection shall be sent by the justices until they shall have heard what the applicant has to say against the objection, unless he refuses or neglects to attend before them on a summons, which summons must state the grounds of objection. Mr. Weston, therefore, must, I presume, have been summoned and the ground of objection stated to him before the notice of objection was sent to the Excise by the magistrates. It does not appear that there is any appeal to the Sessions in the case of a first application, the appeal being limited to an objection to the renewal of a licence already granted. The Act was one brought in by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I cannot give any assurance as to a Bill for altering its provisions.

MR. COX said, he would give notice that he should to-morrow ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will bring in a Bill to compel magistrates to give their reasons for refusing applications for licences?

NAVY—THE "RESEARCH" AND "ENTERPRISE."—QUESTION.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the table of the House, Copy of the Reports of Captain de Horsey on Her Majesty's Ships Research and Enterprise?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, he had already stated that Captain de Horsey's Reports upon these two ships were partly favourable and partly unfavourable. They were very voluminous, and were accompanied by various diagrams, so that they could not easily be published. He had further to observe that they were to all intents and purposes confidential Reports from officers to their superiors; and if he were to make a practice of laying Reports of this nature on the table, the Admiralty would never receive papers which were not drawn up with a view to publication.

TROOPS FOR JAPAN.

QUESTION.

LORD NAAS said, in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald), he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether a force of Marines has been sent from this country to Japan, of how many men it consists, and when it was despatched from this country?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET stated, in reply, that on the 21st of December last Her Majesty's ship Conqueror was sent to Japan with a limited crew and 500 marines.

PASSPORTS IN FRANCE.

QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, he wished to say a few words in putting the Question of which he had given notice. At this time of the year there were a great many British subjects travelling in France; and it was of great importance that they should know whether or not they were required to carry passports; and, if so, whether the French visé was necessary? No one who had any experience of the subordinate officials of the French Government could fail to be aware that they were rather difficult people to deal with, and occasionally went beyond the orders of their superiors. A year or two since the French Government gave out that no inquiries would be made of British subjects travelling in France; but cases had come to his knowledge in which these orders had not been carried out. He hoped the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs would be able to give a clear and definite statement as to whether passports were required on the part of British subjects in France.

MR. LAYARD said, it was well known that the Emperor of the French, with great liberality, had removed all restrictions upon British subjects travelling in France. He had never heard any complaints of the nature mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. French visés were not required for British subjects, nor was a passport necessary; but occasionally a traveller might be asked for his passport in order to identify his nationality. But although a passport was not essentially necessary, he should advise travellers to provide themselves with passports. He had always received the greatest civility from the French authorities when travelling, and he had never heard of a bond fide British subject being subjected to inconvenience. The countries in which a passport was not required at present were Bavaria, Belgium, Denmark, Holland, France, Italy, Prussia, Spain, Sweden, and Norway. In all other Continental countries passports were required.

POOR RELIEF IN THE METROPOLIS.

QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he had a Question of considerable importance to bring under the notice of the House, and that he might put himself in order he would conclude with a Motion for adjournment. The subject to which he wished to call attention was one of great magnitude. A very extraordinary proceeding on the part of those who administered the poor relief of the country had been resorted to, in passing the second reading of a Bill yesterday in so hurried a manner that the Bill had not first been printed, and consequently no copy of the Bill was at the time in the hands of hon. Members. The effect of the Bill was to subvert the whole system upon which the administration of the relief of the poor was founded—namely, a combination of the principles of taxation and representation. He had not had time to give notice to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board of his intention to bring forward the subject; but the right hon.

Gentleman could scarcely complain, as he himself had given no notice to the House of the nature of his Bill. The object of the Bill was to provide for the relief of the casual poor of the metropolis, and it enabled certain persons who had not heretofore been connected with the administration of the Poor Law system to pay money to any amount and throw the whole burden upon the property within the metropolitan district. Never had such an attempt been made to smuggle through an important measure, involving a totally new principle, in so objectionable a manner. The Bill was not printed in time to be distributed to hon. Members yesterday morning, although it was down for a second reading yesterday afternoon: he went to his Club, and the Bill was not to be found there; and on inquiring at his own house, at six o'clock, he found that a copy of the Bill was not delivered there until three or four o'clock in the afternoon. Yet the Bill, which he might say had been smuggled through the second reading, contained a provision that the Metropolitan Board of Works should be able to give any sum of money the guardians of unions might be pleased to ask for, without having the slightest knowledge whether it was honestly, properly, or judiciously administered. The Metropolitan Board of Works was understood to be established for the better management of the metropolis in reference to sewerage, paving, draining, lighting, and cleansing; and he saw no reason why they should be introduced into the administration of the poor relief, and the proceeding that had been taken was contrary to all Parliamentary usage. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board, if he intended to go on with the Bill during the present Session, and in order to afford him an opportunity of explaining his views he would move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."

MR. SPEAKER said, it was perfectly competent for an hon. Member to invite the attention of the House to anything which he thought irregular in its course of proceeding; but it would not be regular on a Motion for the adjournment of the House to enter into a discussion of the merits of the Bill which stood for consideration to-morrow.

EDUCATION—INSPECTORS' REPORTS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HUNT said, he wished to take that opportunity of making an appeal to the noble Lord at the head of the Government with regard to a Motion which stood on the paper, for rescinding a Resolution of the House relating to the Education Inspectors' Reports. The House would recollect that the Resolution was passed on the 12th of April last, and that in consequence of that Vote of the House, the Vice President of the Committee on Education retired from his office. A Committee was subsequently appointed to inquire into the matter, and it had now presented its Report, which referred to the evidence taken and to an appendix setting forth certain Inspectors' Reports that had been marked, or returned, or otherwise dealt with by the Department. Well, the evidence and the appendix to which the Report referred were not yet in the hands of Members; and in addition to that reason for not now proceeding with the Motion he begged to remark that it would be a most unusual and most objectionable course, at the very end of the Session, when probably there would not be half the number present which passed the Resolution, for the Government to attempt to rescind it. He did not wish now to say a word about the merits of the Motion, and whenever it came on he should be prepared to give it a fair and candid consideration; but as a matter of principle he must enter his protest against that attempt to smuggle through the rescission of a Resolution which had been passed when the House was tolerably full. It might be said that the Department against which the Resolution was directed ought not to be left under the imputation which that Resolution might be supposed to cast upon it till Parliament met again. But he must observe that the Government had not shown any great hurry to remove the stigma from the Department, because the Resolution was passed on the 12th of April, and the Motion for appointing the Committee was not made till one month afterwards. Therefore the Department sat very comfortably under whatever imputation might have been thought to rest upon it for a month; and they might, therefore, very well allow the Motion of which notice was now given to stand over till next Session, when it could be fairly and properly considered. It was a very unusual thing to move to rescind a Resolution of the House. It might be quite right to rescind that Resolution, but it ought to be done deliberately and after all the Members of the House had had a full opportunity of reading the evidence on which the Report was founded; then, if the House thought fit to rescind the Resolution, well and good. But he wanted to know whether the noble Lord could point to any case where it had been attempted to rescind a Resolution during the last few days of the Session, when, as they well knew, the whole of the business was entirely under the control of the Government. He did not know whether the Department, the conduct of which was supposed to have been impugned, would be very well satisfied with such a rescission, because what would it amount to? A Resolution had been passed, after due notice, and in a tolerably full House; and if the noble Lord made his Motion on Monday, when probably the House would consist of about half the number of Members who voted in the minority on the previous occasion, what would be the validity and effect of such a decision? He did not think it could be very satisfactory to the Department, and it could hardly satisfy the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) who had felt so sore on the point as to throw up his office. Certainly, if he were the right hon. Gentleman, he should prefer that the Motion be postponed till another Session, when, if carried, it might really afford some consolation to him. He begged, therefore, to suggest that the noble Lord should postpone his Motion.

JAPAN—DESPATCH OF TROOPS.

QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he wished to know upon whose authority the troops of the Line and Marines have been sent to Japan? If they are sent by the authority of the Cabinet they can state their reasons. If not, they must have been sent by the authority of some subordinate authority. He should like to know whether it is constitutional for anybody to involve the country in war, and whether the Despatch of General Brown will be laid on the table previous to the debate?

CASUAL POOR (METROPOLIS) BILL.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he had received a copy of the Casual Poor (Metropolis) Bill before ten o'clock yesterday morning, and he confessed he had learnt with surprise that a measure of such importance had been brought forward at the fag end of the Session. He had had a great deal of communication with his constituents on that question, and while everybody must be convinced that something should be done with regard to casual destitution in the metropolis, yet the general feeling was that having waited so long they ought to wait till an opportunity should be afforded for the proper consideration of the Bill, without hurrying it through the House in the manner now proposed. He thought it impossible that the measure should pass in the present Session, but if the Government persisted in going on with it, it would be his duty in Committee to move Amendments which would be likely to raise considerable discussion.

MR. T. J. MILLER said, that at present the Metropolitan Board of Works had had no opportunity of discussing that question; but they were to meet to-morrow, when they would be able to do so, and to give their opinion upon it.

MR. LYALL, as a Member of the Poor Law Committee, which had sat for three years, wished to say that the Committee were unanimous in the opinion that the subject of this Bill should be early considered, and its principle carried out. They all knew what great distress occurred last winter in the metropolis, when they heard many harrowing tales respecting the condition of the casual poor; and it was therefore a matter of urgency that this question should be dealt with promptly.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that the President of the Poor Law Board made his statement with reference to this Bill about two o'clock in the morning, when not fifteen Members were present; but the right hon. Gentleman gave no notice that he intended to hurry the measure through so rapidly as actually to read it a second time before it was printed. [No!] At least he did not get his copy before the second reading. The Bill was one of the greatest importance, and he could not understand why it had been brought in so late in the Session, when it could not possibly receive due consideration. He had a great objection to the Metropolitan Board of Works being mixed up with the relief of the poor.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he had no idea the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) would have taken that opportunity of stating his views regarding this Bill. He had stated, in reply to a Question put by the hon. Member for White-haven (Mr. Lyall), that he did intend, in deference to the unanimous opinion and recommendation of the Committee, to introduce a measure on this subject. It was not possible to collect the opinions of the guardians of unions in the metropolis, but he thought it his duty to bring it forward even at that late period of the Session; and, as he did not expect any opposition, he hoped it would pass. On the following evening he moved for leave to bring in the Bill, but not at so late an hour as had been stated by his hon. Friend. [Sir JOHN SHELLEY: At five minutes to two.] It was very shortly after one, immediately after the Orders of the Day had been disposed of. It was very important and urgent that some provision should be made for the objects of this Bill before the coming winter set in. It in no sense transferred the poor from the Boards of Guardians to the Metropolitan Board of Works; but he said he thought that the Metropolitan Board might collect the trifling sum that would be necessary for the support of this class of the poor. The Bill was under their consideration, and he hoped they would consent to do that. He anticipated certainly the opposition of his hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Sir John Shelley), but he certainly did not anticipate any opposition from the other side. Before he proceeded to move the second reading, he had taken care to inform himself that the Bill was in the hands of Members generally, having ascertained at the Vote Office that the Bill was printed and delivered to Members with the Votes. [Lord CLAUD HAMILTON said, he did not receive his copy till between three and four in the afternoon.] Well, that must have been a solitary instance. He had even been urged to put the Bill for Committee to-day, but thought it better to place it in the Orders for to-morrow. There would be ample opportunity for hon. Members to express their opinions on the subject on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair. He could not, therefore, admit that the House had been at all taken by surprise. He certainly, however, was taken by surprise at the objection which had been stated. There was no novelty in the case. The Committee had been sitting for three years upstairs; they had carefully considered the matter; they were unanimous in their recommendation; and the hon. Gentleman who was most urgent for the adoption of the measure sat on the other side. When, therefore, he (Mr. C. P. Villiers) saw the urgency of the case, he saw no reason to postpone the Bill. He hoped hon. Gentlemen opposite would consider whether they had any good reasons for opposing it.

MR. H. BAILLIE observed, that the right hon. Gentleman adopted the course of the young woman who when charged with having had a bastard child vindicated herself by saying it was a very small one. The right hon. Gentleman said this was a very small Bill; but it was a very important one, and it was disrespectful to the House—indeed it was treating the House with contempt—to bring forward such a Bill at that period of the Session, when most of those who took an interest in these questions had left town. He trusted the Government would reconsider their decision. The charge was, not that the Bill was read a second time before it was printed, but that in the very last days of the Session—after the Appropriation Bill had been brought in, and when there were very few Members present besides the occupants of the Treasury Bench—a Bill involving such a total change in the constitution of the Poor Law was attempted to be shuffled through the House.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he was present when the right hon. Gentleman made his communication to his hon. Friend the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Lyall), and he certainly did not understand that the Bill involved the new principle, that the Metropolitan Board of Works should be made an engine for levying the poor rates. He believed there would be found to be a difference of opinion on the Bill when it came to be discussed, and he thought the fullest opportunity should be given for the consideration of so important a proposal.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: In answer, in the first place, to the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire (Lord Robert Montagu) who asked, by whose authority it was that troops of the line and marines had been sent to Japan—whether it was or was not by order of the Government?—I have to state that this force was sent on the decision of the Government. We thought it desirable to increase the defensive force on that station. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), I have to state that I thought it my duty to take the earliest moment, after the Report of the Committee was in the hands of Members, to ask the House to do justice—as I conceive—to my right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), and the Department to which he belonged. I apprehend there will in all probability be as large an attendance on Monday as when the Resolution in April passed. There were not 200 Members present on that occasion; and that number at least, in all probability, will be present on Monday. That will be the time for the hon. Gentleman to put forward any objection he may entertain to the proposition. I cannot, in deference to his wishes, postpone the Motion of which I have given notice.

LORD HOTHAM said, he regretted very much that the noble Lord had refused to give way in this matter. He entirely agreed with the objection of his hon. Friend on the score of time and usage. Considering the period of the Session—considering that the Appropriation Act had been brought in—considering the small attendance they could expect—considering the importance of proposing to rescind a solemn Resolution of the House—and considering how difficult it would be to adduce any instance of such a proposal as that of which the noble Viscount had given notice—being made at such a time and under such circumstances, he did deeply regret the decision of the noble Viscount, and he did sincerely hope he would reconsider his determination. He should be glad to know what was the particular object of the Motion? Was it for the sake of the Department or for the sake of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe)?

MR. SPEAKER would remind the noble Lord that he was now entering upon the subject-matter of a Motion that was fixed for to-morrow.

LORD HOTHAM would bow at once to the decision of the Chair. His object simply was to impress on the noble Viscount the impolicy, on every account, of bringing forward such a Motion at that period of the Session. He begged it to be understood that he could have no hostility to the right hon. Gentleman, his objection applied solely to the proposition itself. He did not know whether he was at liberty to allude to what had transpired within the Committee of which he was a member; but this, he might be allowed to say, that the Members of the Committee were perfectly satisfied that, as far as the right hon. Gentleman was personally concerned, everything had been satisfactorily explained; and he would say, moreover, if his (Lord Hotham's) wish had been followed it would have been this—that while the Committee made its Report on the case generally, the Chairman should have been instructed by the Committee to state to the House, on the Motion for printing the Report, that in the opinion of the Committee the difference which had existed between the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne and the noble Lord below (Lord Robert Cecil)—the direct contradiction on a matter of fact—had been satisfactorily explained, and that it was the unanimous opinion of the Committee that the resignation of the right hon. Gentleman was totally and entirely unnecessary. Under these circumstances, it was not to be supposed that he had any hostility to the right hon. Gentleman. He was acting solely on principle, and feeling strongly that the usual course of proceedings in the House should not be departed from. There was yet another objection to be urged against the course proposed to be taken by the noble Viscount. There were two parties to this unfortunate misunderstanding. There was the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) who was then in his place, and would most probably be there on Monday, on the one hand, and there was the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil) on the other. Whether the noble Lord was in London or in England he could not tell; but certainly he could not have expected that such a proposition would have been made at this period of the Session. He asked, therefore, whether it would be decorous to enter upon a question of this sort when one of the parties was absent? Again, he implored the noble Viscount, for the sake of the Department, which he thought might rest satisfied after the Report of the Committee, and for the sake of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, not to ask the House to come to a conclusion to which, supposing the questions were brought forward at a proper time and in a proper manner, every one might readily assent. He said that without committing himself to any opinion at present; but if the Motion were pressed on Monday, and a difference of opinion were expressed upon the point of form, it would be easy for the country to suppose that it was based upon the facts of the case, and, therefore, it might be injurious to the right hon. Gentleman, a result which he (Lord Hotham) had no desire to see.

LORD FERMOY appealed to the President of the Poor Law Board to reconsider the arrangement he had made in respect of the Metropolitan Casual Poor Bill. He would be prepared at the proper time to show that the Bill as it was drawn would not work, and therefore, in Committee, much discussion would arise. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would bring on the Bill at a time when it could be fully discussed, whether at a morning or an evening sitting.

NAVY—THE "LORD WARDEN" TARGET.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY: I rise to ask a Question of which I have given private notice to the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty. It will be in the recollection of the House that on a recent occasion I stated that the "Lord Warden target" had been completely penetrated by shot more than once at the trial of that construction. The noble Lord denied that the target had been penetrated at all, though he said it had been roughly used. I ask him, therefore, whether, in stating that the 300-pounder Armstrong gun had failed to penetrate the Lord Warden target, he alluded to 300lb. rifled shot, or to the 168lb. steel spherical (smooth-bore) shot; and whether the Lord Warden target was not completely penetrated by three shots, one of them being the 300lb. rifle shot fired from the 300-pounder 10½-inch gun, with 45lb. of powder, as I stated to the House?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I regret that I did not sufficiently explain my meaning upon the occasion referred to, and I also regret that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had not then amplified his statement, as in either case this misunderstanding could not have arisen. It was the 300lb. smooth-bore gun to which I referred when I said it had failed to penetrate the Lord Warden target. [SIR JOHN HAY: What size of shot?] With 168lb. shot. That is the only gun of the size in use in the navy—the same as is on board the Royal Sovereign. But it is true that one of the 300lb. rifled guns carrying a 300lb. shot did pierce the target after it had been fired at for a long time and was much shaken. I must remark, however, that the gun then used was one concerning which there were grave doubts whether it was strong enough to bear the concussion of such heavy shot, and consequently whether it was a gun fit to be introduced into the navy.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE—KAFFIR WAR.
QUESTION.

MR. S. WESTERN said, he wished to ask, Whether there were any grounds for the apprehensions expressed in the newspapers of another Kaffir war?

MR. CARDWELL said, that by the latest intelligence received by the Hydaspes, he was informed that the Governor had telegraphed on the 27th of June for all available troops to be sent to the frontier, as there were apprehensions that Krelu intended to cross into the Trans-Kei territory. A later telegram of the 28th announced that there were hopes that such an occurrence would not take place; and still later, on the 29th, a confident hope was expressed that no difficulty of that kind would occur.

JAPAN—DESPATCH OF TROOPS.

QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, the noble Lord at the head of the Government had only answered one of his Questions—that as to the expedition of Marines to Japan. He would, therefore, ask, Whether the troops were sent to Japan in consequence of a decision of the Cabinet; and also whether the despatch of General Brown would be given before the debate of to-morrow night?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The troops which were sent from Hong Kong were sent in consequence of a requisition from Sir Rutherford Alcock in Japan, and not in consequence of orders from the Government here. The troops were sent to Hong Kong in order to be in readiness in case they might be wanted; but the immediate cause of their removal was a requisition from Sir Rutherford Alcock. The noble Lord asks whether the despatch of General Brown will be laid on the table to-morrow in time for the discussion? That I am not able to say. I cannot say whether that despatch by itself is one which should be laid upon the table without other accompanying despatches, but I will inquire.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PLATING.—EXPLANATION.

MR. LAIRD hoped to be allowed to make a personal Explanation of a circumstance which occurred on Tuesday. In the course of the debate upon the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham (Sir Frederic Smith), he had ventured to make a few remarks. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty also spoke and made one observation which he (Mr. Laird) did not catch at the time, and of which he was not made aware until he was leaving the House. He (Mr. Laird) had stated, as was reported in The Times, referring to the Enterprise, that at the request of the noble Lord he went to the Admiralty to see the plans, and he found the armour-plating was only one foot above the water. [Lord CLARENCE PAGET said, that was a confidential communication.] The facts relating to that visit were these. Upon March 10 he put this Question to the noble Lord, which, with the answer, he would read—

"Mr. LAIRD said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what is the depth from the deep-load water-line at the fore and aft ends of Her Majesty's ships Enterprise and Research to the top of the armour-plating; and what depth of side above that is unprotected by armour-plating?"

"Lord CLARENCE PAGET: the armour-plates of the Enterprise are only to the water-line, and that part of the ship which contains her batteries. With regard to the Research, a much larger vessel, she has armour-plates right up to the beam of the lower deck. I do not think it desirable to state the exact number of feet and inches, the hon. Gentleman asked for, but if he will come to the Admiralty I shall be very happy to show him full details of each ship."—[3 Hansard, clxxiii. 1757.]

Upon that invitation he went to the Admiralty and saw the plans; but if he had believed that the information thus afforded him was to be regarded as confidential, and that he was not to use it, he should not have gone to the Admiralty. He had asked the question for public information, and not for himself. Since he had put that question he had seen in print, in a book published last year, an exact description of the vessels in question, the depth of armour-plating, and all details, and he had also seen in the public prints a full description of those vessels.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he fully acquitted his hon. Friend of any intention of making an improper use of the information he had received. He should state that the hon. Gentleman had moved for many Returns as to armour-plating, with statements of dimensions of vessels, and other information. These Returns had been conceded to the hon. Gentleman, but he was bound to say that for granting it he (Lord Clarence Paget) had been blamed by officers of the navy. The hon. Gentleman then asked what was the depth of the armour-plating above or below the water-line in certain ships? The Duke of Somerset was strongly of opinion that those were details which ought not to be published. If those details had been published, and this country had been at that time unfortunately engaged in war, it would have afforded to our enemies information as to the exact spots in which to plant their shot. The Returns were, therefore, refused; but as the hon. Member was one who was held in great respect at the Admiralty, he was told that he could see the details for his own information. It was to be regretted that the hon. Gentleman had made public that information; but after his explanation there was no doubt he had done so under a misapprehension.

ROYAL ACADEMY.—QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, pending future arrangements, the Royal Academy will be allowed to continue as heretofore?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was not aware of anything to prevent the Royal Academy from continuing its functions pending future arrangements.

EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS. COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

SIR CHARLES WOOD: Sir, when I had the honour of addressing the House this time last year upon the subject of Indian finance, I stated that, so far as it was possible to judge, the experience of the preceding year had fully verified the predictions which I had ventured to utter in the year 1859, that, in three or four years' time, we should witness the restoration of our Indian finances to a prosperous condition. I am now happy to say that the experience of another year does but confirm that opinion. I was told at the time I uttered those predictions, that the hopes which I was holding out were entirely fallacious; but I am glad to say that the course of events has proved that I was not mistaken. In the third year from 1859—namely, in the year ending the 30th of April, 1862, the equilibrium of the Indian revenue and expenditure was so nearly restored, that on a revenue and charge of about £44,000,000 the deficit was no more than £50,000. In the year ending the 30th of April, 1863, the accounts of which are now before the House, instead of a deficit, there was a surplus of £1,827,000. In the year ending the 30th of April last the surplus is estimated at £257,000, and Sir Charles Trevelyan anticipates that the surplus at the end of the current year will amount to £823,000. This increase has been accomplished mainly by a great reduction of expenditure in India, but to a great extent by an increase in the important branches of revenue; and although we were compelled to increase many of the taxes, and to impose some new ones, a considerable portion of these have already either been repealed or reduced. I am not aware that the demands of the public service have been in any instance stinted in the expenditure which was necessary for them, or that there has been any neglect of the measures which should be adopted to encourage the development of our resources in India; and I think the House will concur with me in the opinion, that it is a most satisfactory state of things when, so soon after so extraordinary a depression of the finances as for three years together took place in India, so large a surplus follows a year in which the expenditure and revenue were nearly equal. But, beyond this, I am happy to say that we have discharged a considerable amount of debt in the course of the last two years. Sir Charles Trevelyan stated in India that this payment of debt had amounted to £9,000,000, and though I think that calculation is rather in excess of the real sum, I do not believe that the difference is very great, because we have paid off in this country a temporary loan of £1,500,000, £256,000 of India bonds, and also debentures which fell due during the last year, to the extent of £5,557,000. The amount of debt paid off in this country is, therefore, £7,313,000. In addition to this, £1,000,000 was paid off in India, so that in the last two years the sum which has been cleared off amounts to £8,313,000.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR: Do those figures appear in any accounts?

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY: What years?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: From the 1st of May, 1862, to the 30th of April, 1864. I stated last year that, in consequence of the apprehension entertained in India by the falling off of the revenue, and of a deficiency of payments by the railroad companies at home, we had at one time borrowed more than we actually wanted. I must now say that the alarm entertained in India was entirely unfounded, and before the end of the year the railway companies paid in to the full extent of the estimate, so that the sum borrowed was not required. [An hon. MEMBER: Was the sum borrowed £5,000,000?] £4,000,000. It is not true, therefore, that the amount of debt paid off has been liquidated from the surplus of the revenue. ["Hear, hear!"] My hon. Friend cheers, as if there were some wonderful discovery in this fact; but he might have easily seen that £8,000,000 of debt could not possibly be satisfied by £3,000,000 of surplus. The financial state of India as it now stands shows that there has been a steady surplus for three consecutive years, following a year in which the revenue and expenditure were pretty nearly balanced; that upwards of £8,250,000 of debt has been paid off. Nor have we accomplished this by unduly reducing our balances, for on the 20th of April the estimated amount of the balances at the treasuries at home and in India is about £19,000,000. Satisfactory as this statement is, I must beg the House not to attach too much importance to the amount of the sums which I have mentioned as indicative of what must necessarily occur in future years; because one item of revenue—opium—will always remain a source of anxiety to the Indian financier. The amount of revenue received from opium in the year 1861-2 was about £6,359,000; and in the year, the accounts of which are now before us, it is £8,055,000, showing an increase of £1,696,000. In the year, however, ending in April last, the receipts in this Department of the revenue fell to the extent of £1,205,000. Therefore, hon. Members will at once see that the revenue from opium cannot be depended upon with any certainty. In fact, by the falling off of the opium revenue in the year which has just closed, the surplus in India was reduced to £30,000. It so happened, however, that by some arrangements made at home with the other Departments of the Government, a larger sum than we expected was received here, and the surplus was thus brought up to £257,000. [Colonel SYKES: The Income Tax?] I will speak of that tax with the other taxation. I do not think it worth while to enter into a detailed statement of the estimates and receipts, as I have sometimes done in former years, when there has been a question as to how the balance turned the one way or the other; and I think it will be more interesting to the House if I give the figures rather more generally. Now, the maximum charge in the year 1858-59 was £50,248,000 and the revenue £36,060,000 leaving a deficit of upwards of £14,000,000. In the next year the deficit was reduced to £10,000,000, and in 1861-2 to £50,000, the charge amounting to £43,880,000, and the revenue to £43,830,000. In the current year Sir Charles Trevelyan has estimated the revenue at £46,163,000, and the charge at £45,340,000, leaving a surplus of £800,000. For the last few years the receipts from the main articles of revenue have been steadily increasing. I will give the House a comparative statement of the receipts of this year and the year 1856-7, the year before the Mutiny, when matters were in their ordinary and normal state; but I must inform them that I cannot specify the amount on every article in that year, because, although we have the receipts on each item separated in the accounts before us, they were not so distinguished in the former year. Since 1856-7 the increase on the land revenue forest and abkarry (that is, the Excise) was £3,500,000, and on opium £3,000,000, I am obliged to put the Customs and salt duties together, because owing to a change which has taken place, the importation of salt from this country having entirely superseded the manufacture of salt in Bengal, the receipt of duty, formerly in the Excise, is now in the Customs. The revenue from salt and Customs has increased in that time about £3,000,000; stamps have increased about £1,100,000; and the whole increase, therefore, amounts to £10,600,000. The land revenue has steadily increased, owing to a larger quantity of land being brought into cultivation, and that is one of the best proofs of the increased prosperity and of the development of the resources of the country. Opium has increased, as I before stated, in a most extraordinary manner, and they anticipate even a larger revenue from it in the course of this year than was received two years ago. The salt revenue, in like manner, has increased in the last two years to the extent of £700,000; but, as I have already mentioned, a great change on this head has taken place. The manufacture of salt by the Government in Bengal has entirely ceased, and the objections which the natives entertained to English salt seem entirely to have vanished. After communications with the Salt Chamber of Commerce in this country, orders have been issued for the sale of the Government stock of salt in India; and henceforth I trust that the importation of salt from this country will entirely supply the province of Bengal. With respect to the income tax, I must observe that it was imposed under the pressure of circumstances, and it certainly is not a tax that has been very successful in India. With regard to the small holders of land under what would here be called Schedule A, hardly any portion of them pay the tax, and the tax on profits in trade, which I fear is not very honestly paid in this country, is hardly paid at all in India. The richest merchants in India somehow or other contrive to evade any considerable payment, and the result is that nearly the whole produce of the income tax in India has proceeded from a few large landholders, from the public fundholders, and from persons receiving salaries. It is not a tax which it is desirable to impose in India, except under circumstances of pressure. Last year 1 per cent was reduced on the income tax, and next year it is proposed to repeal the whole, as a general tax, leaving only a portion for the purpose of defraying certain local expenditure, which ought to be defrayed by the inhabitants of the particular districts. With respect to the Customs duties, hon. Gentlemen are aware that under the pressure of circumstances they were raised from 5 per cent to 10 per cent. Within a couple of years the duty on piece goods and yarns was reduced to the former amount of 5 per cent, and 3½ per cent ad valorem. The duty on beer was considerably reduced last year, and this year the remaining 10 per cent duties will all be reduced to 7½ per cent. Therefore, with respect to all articles imported into India, nearly the whole of the temporary duties are already reduced. It is true, however, that the Customs duties are not very productive, and, omitting the duties on piece goods and salt, the whole amount is not much above £1,000,000. Of that sum of £1,000,000, more than one-half is paid on articles consumed by Europeans, such as spirits and wine, or which hardly ought to pay duty at all, such as metals, railway articles, and the result is that the whole amount of the Customs duties levied on articles consumable by the natives little exceeds £400,000. When it is considered that the people of India are improving in condition, and that in this country £38,000,000 are raised by duties on the great articles consumed by the mass of the people, sugar, tea, spirits, wine, &c., it is a striking circumstance that so small an amount of revenue should be derived from articles imported into India for the use of the mass of the inhabitants. When pressed by the people of Manchester to repeal altogether the duty on piece goods, I can only say that without these two duties on salt and piece goods, the mass of the people in India would be practically untaxed. It appears that the first articles of luxury in which the people indulge are gold and silver ornaments, such as bracelets, armlets, &c. No duty is paid on these articles, and the extent to which they are used accounts in a great measure for the way in which the large importations of gold into India have been absorbed. Consequently, we do not derive in India in respect of taxable articles of consumption the same advantage which other countries do from the improved condition of the people. That improved condition, however, is evidenced by the great rise which has taken place in wages, which has made it necessary for the Government to take into consideration the emoluments, not only of the native army, but of the lower-paid civil servants. The pay of the Native officers and soldiers has been increased chiefly by additional good conduct pay. The expenditure on public works is much larger now on account of the rise in the rate of wages; and the administration of justice, in like manner, is much more expensive. As a country advances in civilization the expense for the administration of justice is greater than in an uncivilized country. The administration of justice in patriarchal style, under the shade of a tree, is cheaper than its administration in a judicial court by an English barrister. The increase of charge in India in two years has been £2,000,000, under the following heads:—Public works, £1,000,000; law, justice, and police, £500,000; surveys and settlements, £500,000. This sort of additional charge must be made if we are to do justice to the country. The increased price of food, which has necessitated an increase of wages, is, to a certain extent, due to the quantity of land diverted to the production of cotton from the production of grain and cereal crops. The distress caused by the failure of the American cotton supply has not been confined to the manufacturing districts of this country. The native manufacture of cotton has been pretty nearly destroyed in India. In one district the people had to resort for support to the public works, and at another place there were disturbances which we were obliged to suppress by force. Hon. Gentlemen will be not a little astonished, I daresay, at the extraordinary increase in the prices of different articles of produce. I have a return which illustrates this in a very striking manner:—

“In 1859 one could buy for a rupee 810 tolas of rice in Ahmednugur; in 1863, 660 tolas; and in the same year in Dharwar, a cotton district, only 525 tolas. In 1859 a rupee procured 2,670 tolas of wheat in Ahmednugur; in 1863, 1,080; and in 1863, in Dharwar, 542. In 1859 a rupee procured 3,240 tolas of bajree in Ahmednugur; in 1863, 1,080; and in 1863, in Dharwar, 568. In 1859, a rupee procured 3,960 tolas of jowaree; in 1863, 1,260; and in 1863, in Dharwar, 595. Again, in 1859, a rupee would fetch 2,760 tolas of grain in Ahmednugur; in 1863, 1,170; and in 1863, in Dharwar, only 536.”

It is not difficult to imagine the extent of the distress which has been occasioned among the working classes by this extraordinary rise in the prices of provisions. So far, however, as this country is concerned, it is very satisfactory to observe the increase in the importation of cotton from India. Rather exaggerated expectations were, at the outset, entertained as to what could be done at once in procuring cotton from India. In no country is it possible that the permanent supply shall very much exceed the permanent demand. If people cannot sell produce they will not grow it. After the experiment tried some years ago of growing cotton for the English market in India, which was entirely superseded by the supply of superior quality from America, and great loss thereby caused to the growers in India, it is not surprising that they were not ready to produce on demand a large quantity of cotton, which but for that sudden emergency would not have been required from them. The first effect of the sudden demand was to bring out all the old stores of cotton, much of it of very inferior quality. It is said that even mattresses and beds were ripped open, and that the cotton inside of them was sent to this country. There was thus a considerable increase in the supply of cotton; but, in order to test the amount of production, we must compare the amount we got last year with the amount we received the year before this sudden demand arose, and not in the year after the increased demand. Even before the extraordinary demand there was a considerable increase in the amount of the supply. In 1858 the quantity of cotton imported from India was 1,185,000 cwt.; in 1859, 1,717,000 cwt.; in 1860, 1,822,000 cwt.; in 1861, 3,295,000 cwt.; in 1862, 3,505,000 cwt.; in 1863, 3,878,000 cwt. Last year I quoted one of the best publications I have seen on the production of cotton in India—letters addressed to a Bombay newspaper by a cotton broker, Mr. Smith, of Liverpool, who travelled over a considerable part of India and made some most sensible observations. Mr. Smith stated very truly that it was absurd to expect a sudden rise in the supply; but if prices were kept up there would be ultimately a steady but gradual increase in the production of cotton. Referring to the accounts of the importation of cotton into this country for the first five months of the year, ending on the 31st of May, the House will see that there has been a steady and remarkable increase in the last years. In the five months of 1858, 1859, and 1861 respectively, the cotton imported from India amounted to about 340,000 cwt. In the five months of 1861 it was 342,000 cwt.; 1862, 734,000 cwt.; 1863, 962,000 cwt.; 1864, 1,247,875 cwt. We are fairly entitled, therefore, to say that the production of cotton in India and its importation into this country have been pretty nearly quadrupled in those periods. In Berar, Nagpore, and the other cotton districts of Central India, the number of acres under cultivation in 1861 was 380,000; in 1862, 427,000, and in 1863, 588,000. Similar progress, I have no doubt, is observable in other parts of India where cotton can be grown. On the score of quantity, therefore, we have every reason to be satisfied with what India has done for us in regard to cotton. I am afraid, however, I cannot say as much as to the improvement in the quality of the cotton. That is, of course, necessarily a much slower process. The grower who receives a high price by weight, has in many cases been tempted to enhance the weight and his profit by unfair means. So great did the evil become, that the Bombay Government passed an Act for preventing the adulteration of cotton; and from the Report of the Inspector who was appointed to carry out the law, I understand he has been very successful in accomplish-

ing that object. The main difficulty, at present, consists in preventing the mixing of different qualities of cotton. Superior and inferior kinds are grown in the same field; and great care is required both in sowing the seed and in picking the pods to prevent a mixture. I have no doubt that when the Indian growers find that they can get a higher price for a better quality they will be clever enough to produce a superior kind of cotton. Of the other articles of produce the return is really very satisfactory. Between 1858-9 and 1862-3 the quantity of coffee exported to this country has increased from about 11,000,000 to 21,000,000 lbs.; of indigo, from 9,000,000 to 11,000,000 lbs.; and of jute, 317,000 to 1,266,000 cwt. The export of wool has increased from 15,000,000 lbs. to 21,000,000 lbs. With regard to the tea grown in India, I am afraid that there is some prejudice against it at the present moment, but I believe that it has very much improved in quality. The extent of the plantations has considerably increased. In Assam the cultivation has been introduced and is carried on by private enterprise, and the result has been so successful that the Assam Tea Company have been enabled to pay their shareholders a dividend of 25 per cent. It has also been successfully introduced by the Government into the North of India, and so successfully that at the present moment all the Government plantations are to be disposed of with the exception of one which has been reserved for the production of seed. I do not possess an account of the quantity of tea exported for a period of years, but the value of that exported in 1858-9 was £60,000, and in 1862-3 it had increased to £223,000. A plantation for furnishing tea seeds and plants has been formed in the Neilgherries. There is another matter which is likely to prove advantageous not only to India but the world at large. Mr. Markham, a clerk in the India Office, has succeeded in introducing from South America the seed of the cinchona tree, from which quinine is obtained, and the cultivation of that plant in the Neilgherry Hills has proved most successful. In January, 1862, 8,600 plants were growing, but in April last the number had increased to 341,000; and what is still more remarkable, the bark of the few trees which have attained sufficient size to enable the quality of the bark to be tested, gave a produce exceeding that of the bark of the same description of tree in South America. The cultivation of the cinchona plant is now being greatly extended, and I believe that the superintendent of the Dutch plantation at Java, who went over to inspect the plantations on the Neilgherry Hills, has declared that the plants are superior to anything they have in Java. The great increase in the exports from India has led to an extraordinary importation of gold and silver. In the last five years the amount has been £50,000,000 of silver and £25,000,000 of gold, but a considerable portion must have been employed by the natives in the manufacture of ornaments for themselves, their wives, and families. A large proportion of the gold and silver imported seems to have disappeared in this way, as it has not been exported anywhere. [Colonel SYKES: Has there been an increase in the coinage?] There has been a great amount of coinage. I do not intend to advert to the subject of the currency, as that question was discussed in the House a short time ago, but I shall be happy to answer any question which may be put to me upon it. [Mr. J. B. SMITH: Has a gold currency been adopted in India yet?] I stated when the subject was before the House a short time ago, that I was not prepared to take any steps in the matter until I had received a report from the Government in India. I have not yet received that report, but I have every reason to believe that I shall do so before long. The public works have been carried on with great vigour, and without any limit as to funds. The only difficulty which has been experienced has been one which we were not prepared to anticipate in India—namely, want of labour. I, in common with others, was for some time under the impression that the supply of labour was abundant in all parts of India; but I am informed that in all districts where the public works are going on, it has been found extremely difficult to obtain an adequate supply of labour. In the central districts in India the railroads and other public works have been in competition with the agriculturists for labour. The consequence has been that the price of labour has been raised, and the cost of the construction of the public works increased. In Assam, South Canara, Central India, Scinde, and the North Western Provinces there is a great want of labour, and unfortunately these are the districts in which English capital and English settlers can be most beneficially employed. So great is the inconvenience which is experienced from the want of labour, that I have been asked to do something towards importing Chinese labourers into India, which is a proposition not a little startling to those who have always been led to believe that the population of India was more than sufficient for the requirements of the country. Railroads are being carried on with great activity in all parts of India. A number of gentlemen have come forward and have undertaken the construction of what is called a light branch railway communication through the northern parts of India. They have done this without a guarantee upon obtaining the land from the Government and a contribution for a certain number of years. The terms are much more favourable to the Government than anything we have hitherto been able to obtain. I sincerely hope that the undertaking will succeed. It will show that works of this kind may be done by private companies, not only with advantage to the country, but to the shareholders themselves. The gauge is the same as that of the great railroads. Beyond that, in the course of the winter, a telegraphic cable has been laid down from Kurrachee to the head of the Persian Gulf. The recommendations of the Commission presided over by the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) to inquire into the sanitary condition of the Indian army, have been followed up by the appointment of Sanitary Commissions in each presidency, who have already commenced their labours, not only with regard to the barracks, but also in reference to the condition of the town of Calcutta. For a long time, to the disgust of the more civilized inhabitants, it has been the practice in Calcutta to throw dead bodies into the river, the result of which was to aggravate during last year the ravages of the cholera, which broke out very severely. It was thought desirable to take some precautionary measure, and the first step taken was to prohibit the throwing of dead bodies into the Ganges. There was no intention on the part of the Government to interfere with the prejudices or wishes of the Hindoo inhabitants of Calcutta; and it will be a consolation to the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Sykes) to know that the prevention of the abomination of throwing dead bodies in the river had the entire approval of the Hindoo municipality of Calcutta. [Sir JAMES FERGUSSON: What about the state of the gaol?] The last report we have received was that the gaol was in a satisfactory state. It had been inspected by the magistrates at Calcutta, appointed under an Act of Parliament, who are bound to inspect it at least once a month. The progress of internal affairs in India is also most satisfactory, and there is no disturbance within our frontier. If there has been some little disturbance just outside our North Western frontier it has turned out to be a matter of very little consequence. Early in the Session, in answer to a question, I stated very shortly what had happened in that case, and perhaps it is right that I should now recur to it. Many years ago a Mahomedan fanatic established himself and his followers in the district beyond the Indus when Runjeet Singh ruled in the Punjab. He contended for some time to defy that ruler, and was ultimately killed, but the remainder of his companions took refuge in the hills and made marauding incursions into the territory of that ruler. When we took possession of the Punjab they had no more love for us than they had shown for Runjeet Singh, and they had been a thorn in our side, more or less, ever since. They were settled on the western bank of the Indus, just on the outside of our frontier, and were in the constant habit of making inroads upon our territory, murdering and plundering the inhabitants of the villages, and disturbing the peace of the district in every possible way. In 1857 an expedition was undertaken against them under Sir Sidney Cotton, who destroyed two of their strongholds, and took engagements from the neighbouring tribes that they would not allow them to harbour among them, or come thence to harass our frontier as they had been wont to do. For a year or two they gave us no further trouble, but being partially strengthened by some mutineers who took refuge among them, these marauders recommenced their incursions. They advanced into our territory and into one of the States under our protection, and committed their usual outrages by murdering the persons whom they came across and burning the villages. We called upon the tribes through whose territory they passed to perform their engagements and arrest their progress. One of those tribes was divided in feeling, one-half of it being disposed to do what it could to prevent these marauders from coming through its territory, the rest not being disposed to do so, and saying that they were too strong for it, and that if we wanted to stop them we must do it ourselves.

Sir Charles Wood

After considerable hesitation Lord Elgin authorized an expedition against the marauders, but the officers on the spot were a little indiscreet in one respect in the course they took. They proceeded by way of the Umbeylah Pass, but they did not take into account sufficiently early the probability of their alarming the powerful tribe of the Bonairs by their advance. They had not the least reason to apprehend any opposition from the Bonairs, who on a former occasion took our part against these marauders, and we had not the least intention of injuring the Bonairs. However, our officers did not send a communication to the Bonairs until they had reached the top of the Umbeylah Pass, within a few miles of their territory, and, with the suspicion natural to an Oriental tribe, the Bonairs thought we were about to attack them. They, therefore, turned out in great force and resisted our troops. They were afterwards joined by other fanatical Mahomedans, but they were repulsed with considerable loss to themselves, but with some loss also among our force. While this was going on, the agent of the Governor General, who had been absent, returned and apparently succeeded in assuring the Bonairs that we had not had the slightest intention to injure them, and they were willing to withdraw. But the fanatical allies from other tribes, under the influence of a sort of Mahomedan prophet called the Akhoond of Swat, persuaded them to continue their resistance. A successful attack was made on their lines, and they were driven from their position, and after two days' fighting the Bonairs themselves, the very people who had commenced the resistance to us before, said they were ready to go with our force and destroy the strongholds of the marauders. That object was accomplished, and the expedition ended as satisfactorily as a matter of that kind could end. It was a most unfortunate circumstance that opposition should have been offered to our troops through a false alarm on the part of the Bonairs. But the greatest pains were afterwards taken to assure them we never had any intention to attack them; that our only desire was that our frontier should not be harassed by bands of plunderers who harboured in their territory; and that we should only be too happy to live on good terms with them. We have no reason to fear that anything of that kind will occur again. [Mr. VANSITTART asked whether the expense of that war had been brought into the accounts?]

The expense is in the estimated expenditure for the past year, and it amounts to between £150,000 and £200,000. Perhaps I should next notice the civil war between the Ameer of Cabul and his brothers. We simply acknowledge the de facto ruler in that case, and refuse to take any part whatever on either side. We are leaving them to fight it out in their own way, and taking the greatest care not to give the slightest assistance to either party. There is only one other quarter which may to a certain extent disturb the peace of our frontier. I refer to Bhootan. For many years inroads have been made by plundering bands of Bhootans in our territory, and it had been determined to send an expedition there, but the mutiny prevented anything of that kind being done, and Lord Elgin thought it better to come to some arrangement if possible with the rulers of that country. There was no reason to believe that the mission to them would not be well received, because on two former occasions such a mission had been favourably received. On the present occasion, the Envoy was grossly insulted. It is difficult to know exactly how he should have acted; but although I think it would have been wiser not to have gone on, we can hardly form a fair judgment after the fact, and I have no doubt of Mr. Eden's having acted to the best of his judgment in very difficult circumstances. It would be hard to blame him now. The country was in a state of complete anarchy. The recognized rulers of the country are a spiritual chief and a temporal chief; there are also an eastern viceroy, and a western viceroy, with subordinate chiefs. At present there are two temporal chiefs, two spiritual chiefs, two eastern and three western viceroys. These viceroys were in a state of hostility with each other. We have not the least notion of going into that country or maintaining any position there; but we do intend to take possession of a narrow strip of low country, and to occupy the passes to prevent inroads, and in that way we may be able to bring them to as much reason as is possible with a race of barbarians. There is another topic to which I should wish to refer—the result of experience with regard to those legislative measures which the Legislature of this country has passed for India. In 1861 three Acts of Parliament passed specially affecting India. One was for admitting in the Council of the Governor General not only Englishmen unconnected with the Government, but Natives of India. The Council of the Governor General and that of the Governor of Madras and of Bombay was increased in this way, and a council was given to the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal. As far as we can judge, that legislation has been successful, and, what is most satisfactory, the Natives who were to form part of the Council seem to have taken a very active part in legislation, and expressed their opinions with freedom, very greatly to the advantage of the Government. Three Natives were put in by Lord Canning, one of whom has since died. Lord Elgin put in three other Natives, and, I think, wisely brought a Native Chief of considerable influence from Madras. Three Natives have been put into the Madras Council, five into the Bombay Council, and eight into the Council of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal. I believe the measure has given the greatest possible satisfaction to the people of India. The next measure passed was one for the improvement of the High Court of Justice. This too has worked well; the barristers, judges, and the civilians have acted very harmoniously together, and a very able Native Judge has been placed on the bench of the High Court of Calcutta. On the recommendation of a Law Commission which I appointed when I was President of the Board of Control, a code of civil procedure has been introduced into India. Upon that subject the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal says—

“The result of all the inquiries I have made from the Native Judges, by whom nearly all original suits are tried, and of whom I have now seen many in different parts of the Lower Provinces, is that the new procedure in working has been successful even above all hope.”

Mr. Harington says—

“As showing how successful the Code of Civil Procedure has been in expediting the administration of justice, it may be mentioned that in a Court of Small Causes in the North Western Provinces, established under the provisions of Act XLII., of 1860, the average duration of suits disposed of during the past year was only eight days, including the day on which the plaint was filed. Under the old system of procedure the average would probably have been between two and three months.”

The third measure was one to enable the Governor General to appoint officers from the civil service to certain offices for which they were not till then eligible. I have laid on the table this year the number of appointments under that Act, and I do not think it will be found that there is reason to complain of any one of them.

The measure has been entirely successful in the objects it sought to accomplish. Since I last addressed the House on this subject we have been deprived by the stroke of death of the services of Lord Elgin, and I know no one better fitted to undertake the Government of India as his successor than that old and eminent servant of India, Sir John Lawrence. I believe it is the opinion of the people of both countries that this appointment is the best that could have been made. Sir John Lawrence will, I feel confident, justify all the expectations that have been formed from his former career, and from his intimate knowledge of the country. And I think that no one could have been found so well qualified as he to fill that high position with advantage. I am happy to think that the policy pursued of late years in regard to India has met with due appreciation on the part of the Natives of India. That policy is not mine. It is the policy of the Sovereign, the policy of this House, the policy of the country at large. I am grateful for the support which I have received from all sides of the House, and more especially the impartial and straightforward support which has been given to all those measures which he believed to be for the good of India by the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, from whom I have seldom differed in matters relating to India. The policy adopted towards the country has been, I repeat, the policy of the Queen and of Parliament, and all that I have done has been faithfully to carry it out. For this reason, that it has been the policy of the country, and that they are entitled to any expressions of gratitude from the people of India. I hope, without being accused of undue vanity, I may be permitted to advert to a resolution passed at a public Native meeting which was convened in Calcutta, and there an address was agreed to which was signed by 8,000 of the most intelligent and influential Natives of that city. At this Native meeting, which was attended by the most influential persons in Calcutta, a resolution was passed which expressed the opinion of all the persons who signed the address. It is as follows :—

"That this meeting desires to record their high sense of gratitude for the wise and beneficent policy which has distinguished the administration and control of Indian affairs for the last five years (by Sir Charles Wood), a policy which has nobly sustained the authority and dignity of Her Majesty's Government in her Indian dominions; which has strengthened by new bonds of attachment the confidence and sympathy of the princes and chiefs of the country; which has, above all, steadily sought to govern the empire in consonance with justice and the true interests of her teeming millions."

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR: What is the date of the meeting?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: It was held in March last year. I claim no credit to myself for what has been done, for although I have received the expression of these thanks, it is not to me, but to the Sovereign and people of this country that the thanks of the people of India are due. There has been the determination to pursue this policy. I have only been the hand to carry it out, and I feel convinced that this country will reap the fruits of this wise and beneficent policy long after I have ceased to take any part in Indian affairs. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the following Resolutions :—

1. That the total net Revenues of the Territories and Departments under the immediate control of the Government of India for the year ended the 30th day of April, 1863, amounted to £3,481,927 sterling, and the Charges thereof, for the same period, other than Military Charges, amounted to £3,049,501 sterling.

2. That the total net Revenues of the Bengal Presidency, for the year ended the 30th day of April, 1863, amounted to £11,755,377 sterling, and the Charges thereof, for the same period, other than Military Charges, amounted to £2,060,713 sterling.

3. That the total net Revenues of the North Western Provinces, for the year ended the 30th day of April, 1863, amounted to £5,162,401 sterling, and the Charges thereof, for the same period, other than Military Charges, amounted to £1,497,179 sterling.

4. That the total net Revenues of the Punjab, for the year ended the 30th day of April, 1863, amounted to £2,612,517 sterling, and the Charges thereof, for the same period, other than Military Charges, amounted to £1,192,674 sterling.

5. That the total net Revenues of the Territories and Departments under the immediate control of the Government of India of the Bengal Presidency, of the North Western Provinces, and of the Punjab, together for the year ended the 30th day of April, 1863, amounted to £23,012,223 sterling, and the Charges thereupon, including the Military Charges, amounted to £14,753,114 sterling, leaving a surplus available for the general Charges of India, of £8,259,108 sterling.

6. That the total net Revenues of the Madras Presidency (Fort Saint George), for the year ended the 30th day of April, 1863, amounted to £5,819,048 sterling, and the net Charges thereof, for the same period, amounted to £5,383,285 sterling, leaving a surplus available for the above Presidency, for the general Charges of India, of £435,763 sterling.

7. That the total net Revenues of the Bombay Presidency, for the year ended the 30th day of April, 1863, amounted to £7,831,597 sterling, and the net Charges thereof, for the same period, amounted to £4,831,841 sterling, leaving a surplus available in the above Presidency, for the General Charges of India, of £2,999,756 sterling.

8.—That the total net Revenues of the several Presidencies, for the year ended the 30th day of April, 1863, amounted to £36,662,867 sterling, and the Charges thereof amounted to £24,968,240 sterling, leaving a surplus Revenue of £11,694,627 sterling.

9.—That the Interest on the Registered Debt of India, paid in the year ended the 30th day of April, 1863, amounted to £3,351,680 sterling, and the Charges defrayed in England, on account of the Indian Territory, in the same period, including Guaranteed Interest on the Capital of Railway and other Companies, after deducting net Traffic Receipts of Railways, amounted to £6,515,601 sterling, leaving a surplus of Indian Income for the year ended as aforesaid, after defraying the above Interest and Charges, of £1,827,346 sterling.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he was quite willing to endorse the commendation of the Calcutta meeting. He believed that the confidence of the Natives of India in us had increased in consequence of the policy we had pursued since the Mutiny—a policy which repudiated annexation. He believed that if that policy had been previously adopted we should have had no mutiny at all, and should have been spared all those harrowing scenes which had occurred. As to the finances of India, the House hardly seemed in a position to discuss them. The Estimates had been laid before the Indian public; but the House of Commons knew nothing officially of what the policy of Sir Charles Trevelyan for the next year might be. He trusted that either Sir Charles Trevelyan's speech or a précis of it would be laid upon the table. There were three sets of Indian accounts. Hon. Members had the Accounts of 1862-3, and the Estimates of 1863-4 before them. But the Estimates of 1864-5 were in the bureau of the Secretary of State for India, and were not accessible to the House. He could not understand the exact position of the land question; but he approved the redemption of the land tax, which had been carried out to a limited extent. The right hon. Gentleman insisted on his system of survey of the waste lands, although it would retard the process of reclamation, and was, he thought, much inferior to the American plan. The coffee plantations on the other side of India were very important. A portion of these were held by English planters and the rest by Natives. It was calculated that 100,000 acres would require capital amounting to £10,000,000 for its due cultivation. The difference, however, was that the English planter raised a great deal more coffee per acre than the Native planter, and it was therefore important to encourage the English planter. The planters desired to have the land sold to them out and out, because, in order that they might borrow money to invest in the culture of coffee, it was necessary that they should have the fee-simple. Many persons were anxious to start companies for the cultivation of coffee; but, in consequence of the refusal of the Government to part with the fee of the land, they could not succeed in their objects. At present it took an emigrant twelve months before he could get land at a public auction, and the expense of living for that time in a Presidency town was a very serious matter. While other countries were bidding for English labour and capital, in India it seemed to be treated as quite a favour that Englishmen should be allowed to engage in the cultivation of land. This spirit ran through all the dealings of his right hon. Friend and the Indian Government. The right hon. Gentleman had made some important observations as to the rate of wages. He said that the rate of wages was rising, and that labour was hard to be had in India. Yet emigration from that country was going on to a great extent, and large estates in Ceylon and Mauritius were cultivated by labour from India. There was some analogy between India and Ireland in this respect—that the people were underfed and the rate of wages was too low. He thought it highly desirable that the Native population should have better food than they were able to procure at present, and therefore he was glad that the rate of wages was rising. He did not think that would add anything to the real cost of the public works. It was impossible that half-starved Natives who only earned 3d. a day should do as much work as was performed by the same people when they went to Ceylon or the Mauritius and received 1s. or 2s. a day. It was the case of the Irishman over again. If you paid him 6d. a day in his own country, you got sixpenny-worth of labour from him, but he did not work as hard as he did when he went to the United States and received a dollar. His right hon. Friend was surprised at the slow rate at which the Customs duties increased, and so was he. The fact was that although the well paid Government officers were well clothed, and that entirely in cotton goods from Manchester, the cultivators of the soil were miserably clad in a mere rag each. He thought that a Finance Minister should not be satisfied unless he saw the Customs revenue increase, for they were a sure index of the condition of the people. He regretted that so little progress had been made with the construction of the Indian telegraph. The delay was mainly attributable to the right hon. Gentleman's adherence to the route by Bagdad and the Persian Gulf, against which he was warned by Sir Henry Rawlinson. He was glad that a line was now being constructed through Persia, and he hoped that we should soon have a complete telegraphic communication with India. Russia had completed a telegraph to the extremity of the Asiatic continent. The progress of railways was extremely satisfactory, but there were some lines which were still much wanted—for instance, lines from Indore to Agra and from Trichinopoly to the South. As to the general question of the construction of public works, he thought that it would be better, instead of raising £4,000,000 annually from the people of India for that purpose, to contract a loan in this country, as was suggested by Lord Dalhousie. There were at present in existence one or two taxes which, either in their nature or the mode of their imposition, were highly obnoxious. In the first class was the institution stamp, which ought at once to be abolished. The tax upon spirits, although proper in itself, was open to great objection in consequence of the mode in which it was levied. The spirits were manufactured by the Government and sold at certain places, under licences which were granted to the persons who undertook to dispose of the largest quantity. This acted as a direct encouragement of drunkenness. The sellers paid a large sum for their licences, and they were obliged to resort to all sorts of means to induce their neighbours to consume the quantity of spirits which they had undertaken to sell. Upon the whole the accounts were satisfactory. The events occurring in the United States had of course exercised great influence upon India, but he was convinced that if the right hon. Gentleman had allowed land to be more extensively sold in fee simple more capital would have been attracted to India, and there would have been a still larger increase in the growth of cotton. If the American contest were now brought to an end, he had no doubt our main supplies of cotton would again flow thence; but if proper measures had been taken during the five years the right hon. Gentleman had presided over the India Office, cotton might have been fixed as a staple production of India. The same care applied to the cultivation of the plant in India as was given to it in America would have greatly increased its value. It was the mixed and dirty cotton that was objected to, and improvement could not be looked for until capital and enterprise were permitted to engage in the trade. In 1858, when the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) was at the head of the India Office, he had many applications from gentlemen and companies to purchase land. How was it that now there were no such applications, or if there were applications why were they refused? The right hon. Gentleman should encourage the introduction of English energy and English capital into India, and thereby benefit both the Indian and Imperial exchequers. He believed, with Sir Charles Metcalfe, that every Englishman who went to India added to its security and resources. He trusted that in future the right hon. Gentleman would not overlook that important point, upon which might depend to a great extent the permanency of our hold upon India. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that Russia, with nothing like our vast resources, was pressing forward in every direction. Only yesterday it was announced that she had concluded terms for railways through Herat and through Persia; she had an immense length of navigation up the Amoor, and she had telegraphic communication with China. Surely it would be well if we were to follow the wise example thus set to us. We ought to fix ourselves in India as firmly as we could, and the best way of doing so was to encourage our countrymen to go there with their capital. The more the Natives were encouraged to lay out their money in the purchase of land the more would they be attached to our Government. He hoped that when next the right hon. Gentleman addressed the House upon this subject he would be able to show that the important points to which his attention had been called had been practically considered. In that case the right hon. Gentleman would increase the claims which he already had upon the gratitude both of this country and of India for having so long administered the affairs of the latter great empire.

Mr. Henry Seymour

Mr. J. B. SMITH said, that while he congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on the improved state of India, he at the same time regretted that he had placed himself in such a position as to make it his (Mr. Smith's) duty to find fault. What he found fault with was—that the right hon. Gentleman had pursued the same course this year which he did last year, namely, of delaying his Indian Budget until two days before the Whitebait feast, when, as usual, not more than twenty Members could be got to listen to it. If the House was to take any cognizance whatever of Indian affairs, it was but just that they should have an opportunity of doing so at a time when they were not in an exhausted state, as they undoubtedly were at the end of the Session. The subject should be brought before the House at an early period of the Session. He had likewise to complain that the right hon. Gentleman had not furnished them with the speech of the Finance Minister of India. He could not account for the right hon. Gentleman objecting to furnish the House with that without which the Indian accounts were nothing but a mass of figures. What could the House make of the Exchequer accounts without the explanation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? When he mooted the question on a former occasion, the right hon. Gentleman said that he might as well be asked for the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech, as for the statement of the Indian Finance Minister. But there was this difference, that the latter statement was made in India, while the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was made in that House, and was printed in all the newspapers the next morning. He could see no just ground for withholding from the House that explanation which was given by the Finance Minister of India, and if the right hon. Gentleman should persevere in bringing forward his Indian Budget at the latter end of the Session, and declined to give the House the explanation of the Finance Minister of India accompanying the Indian accounts, he should feel it his duty in the next Session of Parliament to bring the subject under the notice of the House. He would again congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the improvement which seemed to pervade all classes of Indian society. There had been a great demand for labour, and a great advance in the price of provisions. That was easily accounted for—the demand for labour had been for Indian railways, and for the growth of a variety of products, especially of cotton. Labour had been transferred from the growth of provisions to the growth of other articles, and the consequence had been a great advance in the price of provisions. There was no question that there had been a great advance in the wealth and capabilities of India, but still he thought the resources of the country were very far from being developed. Their railways would do something in that respect; but he regretted to find that so little attention was still paid to opening out the navigable rivers, the natural highways of India. The Godavery with its affluents was a highway 2,000 miles long, but only about 400 miles of the river, was at present navigable; and he regretted to find from the Reports which had been laid on the table respecting that river, that there was little hope of those 400 miles being much extended. The right hon. Gentleman had made some observations about the Customs duty on cotton, which he said amounted to £500,000. He did not know whether the estimate of the duty on cotton goods was taken at 10 per cent or $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. [Sir CHARLES WOOD: In 1862 the duty was reduced to 5 per cent.] Well, the duty might be said to be 5 per cent, but it was in reality 10 per cent, and he considered it altogether an unjust tax. It was founded upon a system of protection, so far as the Indian manufacturer was concerned. In India there was a protection which could not be taken away. There they had the cotton on the spot, and England had to fetch it 10,000 miles, manufacture it into goods, and then send those goods back to India. When, in addition to all the expense these processes involved, we had to pay a high Customs duty, protection to a very large extent was of course afforded to the Indian manufacturer. Sir Charles Trevelyan complained that the great embarrassment to the trade of India had been the want of imports to meet the large amount of exports, and he said every possible encouragement should be given to the import trade. In his (Mr. Smith's) opinion the best way to encourage imports was to abolish the duty on cotton goods, and they would thus meet the objection which Sir Charles Trevelyan made. But if it was necessary to raise that revenue on cotton goods, then the duty ought to be levied on a fair principle, which would give the English manufacturer a chance. If they levied a duty on the goods of the English manufacturer, they ought to levy a like duty on the goods of the manufacturer in the country, otherwise they afforded to the Indian manufacturer an unjust protection. Sir Charles Trevelyan, speaking of the sale of opium, said that one of the causes of the decline in the price of opium was the difficulties connected with the monetary system. He stated that in 1859 the price of a chest of opium was 1,429 rupees, while at another period it was 1,100 rupees, being a difference of 300 rupees a chest. This showed the importance of the right hon. Gentleman turning his attention to the gold currency for India. He (Mr. Smith) must confess he had little expectations of a sound measure from Sir Charles Trevelyan, and that was from this circumstance—he said the effect of the gold currency would be that the depreciation of gold would be arrested. Now he there assumed that gold had been depreciated, and any one who concocted a measure on that assumption would not be likely to make it a sound one. He hoped the Secretary of State for India would do something on this subject. In conclusion, he could only repeat his congratulations at the favourable report of the finances and prospects of India as made by the right hon. Gentleman, and he hoped he would be able to do something in reference to the complaints which he (Mr. Smith) had felt it his duty to make.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he did not think any blame could fairly be imputed to his right hon. Friend the Secretary for India for not introducing his Budget at an earlier period of the Session when the difficulty of getting in the accounts was taken into consideration. Even if it could be brought forward at an earlier period, he scarcely imagined that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to secure a larger attendance of Members than was usual when Indian Questions were being discussed. The real point to be dealt with was, had India improved of late years? and he must say, after the speech which he had heard from the responsible Minister for the country, that there were the strongest evidences of her material progress. He regretted his right hon. Friend had made no allusion to the enormous duty on salt, than the bringing of which within easier reach of the poorer classes there could be no greater measure of relief. He should not enter into a detail of the great suffering which was occasioned by the existing state of things in that regard, but he hoped that, with the prospect of an increasing revenue before them, the matter would not escape the attention of the Government. Unless they took some steps in that direction, he should feel it to be his duty to bring the question under the consideration of the House early next Session.

MR. VANSITTART said, he quite concurred in much that had fallen from the hon. Gentleman who spoke last but one, and whom he was happy to see sitting on the Opposition Benches—an indication he hoped that those on that side of the House might look forward to receiving his valuable support in future. He also concurred with the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Henry Seymour) in regretting that he had not the advantage of the speech of Sir Charles Trevelyan before him, for he had, he believed, set down his surplus at the modest figure of £20,000. However that might be, he did not entertain any confident expectation of a permanent improvement in the finances of India, while so many reasons existed to disturb the calculations of a Chancellor of the Exchequer. Our surplus this year would have been larger, but for the hastily conceived and badly organized proceedings on the North Western frontier; and the surplus of next year, he believed, would be swallowed up in consequence of that insatiate and insatiable desire to thrust our trade and commerce upon the inhabitants of Bhootan, which had resulted in our envoys being grossly insulted—the probable consequence of which was that war would be carried on in those sterile and mountainous regions, if it had not already been commenced. The taxpayers in this country would find their expenditure largely increased owing to our wars in New Zealand, China, Japan, Ashantee, the Cape of Good Hope, and, he believed, in Bhootan. These two hostile collisions in India might have been avoided if we had followed the plan which we had adopted at Cabul, where our negotiations were conducted through a Native. By this method the prejudices of the Natives were conciliated, and the terms upon which the British Government stood with reference to Cabul were of the most amicable character. It was notorious that even in time of profound peace, our surplus in India depended entirely upon the value of the sales of opium. There appeared to be two systems existing in India in reference to the cultivation of opium. The one was carried on in Bengal, where the Government was the producer; and the other in Malwa and Central India, where the Government did nothing but levy a duty on its exportation to China. This duty was originally 200 rupees or £20 a chest, but it was gradually raised by Sir Robert Hamilton to 500 rupees, or £50 a chest. Lord Canning was anxious to raise it to 600 rupees, but he was dissuaded, because, as long as the opium was grown by the British Government in Bengal, and was a Government monopoly in that Presidency, the producer in Malwa and Central India had not a fair market for competition. The actual cost per chest in Malwa to the producer varied from 300 to 400 rupees, or from £30 to £40, and the average selling price might be estimated at from £100 to £120, sometimes falling as low as £80 or £90. Taking, therefore, the cost of production at £35 and the duty at £50, there would remain a profit of about £15 to cover risk, insurance, and other contingencies. If the Bengal monopoly glutted the China market, the price of the chest would fall, and the loss to the Central Indian merchant would almost inevitably entail his ruin. Sir Robert Hamilton had proposed to check the monopoly of growth by the British Government in Bengal by placing an uniform duty of £50 a chest on all opium exported to China, wherever and by whomsoever grown, and thus adopt the Central India system uniformly throughout the whole of India. He believed that if this were done, we should not have any decrease in our revenue from the sale of opium, and that our China trade would be placed on a healthy foundation without involving in so disgraceful a speculation the British Government, the Secretary for India, and his Council.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, he desired to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the effect of the duty imposed on saltpetre. On the assumption that they possessed a monopoly, the Government of India, in 1860, raised the duty to 50 per cent on the value of the article. Previous to that period the export duty had been 3 per cent on the value. The price of saltpetre was 26s. per cwt, and the duty £6 per ton, which was an enormous duty; and, in consequence of it, people of an inventive turn of mind had turned their attention to finding a substitute for it, and had discovered in a preparation from nitrate of soda an article which was applicable to many of the purposes for which saltpetre was used, and large quantities of this article were imported from Magdeburg and other towns of Germany. In 1859—the last year before the change in the duty—the quantity of saltpetre exported from Calcutta was 25,000 tons; in 1860 it was 19,000; in 1861, 22,600; in 1862, 31,000; in 1863, 21,000; and in 1864 the falling off it was calculated would be to a considerable extent. Now, up to 1860, there had been no saltpetre received from the German ports; but, in 1861, 1,591 cwt. were received; in 1862, 4,480; in 1863, 8,418; and in 1864, down to the 31st of May, no less than 12,510 cwt.; showing the extent to which we are receiving supplies of manufactured saltpetre from foreign countries to the exclusion of the saltpetre which we used to receive from India. The quantity of nitrate of soda supplied from Peru and Chili was in proportion to the quantity of saltpetre received from German ports. The quantity of saltpetre received from Bengal and exported from this country had fallen off from 151,000 cwt. in 1862, to 74,000 in 1863, and this year to the present time the exports were 41,000. The deduction from this was, that the trade was in considerable jeopardy from the heavy duty on the export from Calcutta. If any advantage from this arrangement accrued to the public he would have no right to complain; but such was not the case, and on the part of those engaged in the trade in the City of London, he had taken the opportunity of laying the matter before his right hon. Friend, in order that it might be brought under the notice of the authorities in India. With reference to the introduction of a gold coinage into India he confessed he was one of those who did not anticipate much advantage from such a measure. The whole of the pressure which had been experienced at Calcutta and Bombay arose not from any want of money, but from the inability of the possessor of hard silver to convert it into current coin. It was within his own knowledge that a person in the possession of silver to the extent of thousands of pounds, had been obliged to pay 15 per cent per annum for the temporary use of coin while his silver was being coined at the mint. He (Mr. Crawford) thought the coining power of the mint ought to be increased at least threefold. The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith) was misinformed when he stated that the best cotton was grown in Dharwar. Considerable quantities had lately come from the interior of India far superior in quality to any that had been grown in Dharwar, as he should be happy to show to any gentleman who would favour him with a call at his office. His hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Henry Seymour) talked about the Russian Government making a railway to Herat; but as Herat was thousands of miles from any civilized part of the Russian dominions, he (Mr. Crawford) received with utter incredulity the statement of such a scheme. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had adverted to the fact that the Government received but little in the shape of Customs duties from the Natives of India. That was a result which could not surprise any one who was acquainted with the mode of living of the people of that country. They drank hardly any wine or spirits, or tea; the sugar and the tobacco which they consumed were manufactured upon the spot, and they therefore made very few purchases of any of the articles on which Customs duties were principally raised. He entirely coincided in the statement of his right hon. Friend, that a considerable increase in wages had taken place in India during the last few years. The fact was, that since railway operations had been carried on in India the value of labour had risen to an extent which no person could a few years ago have thought possible. He was glad to be able to join the Members who had preceded him in congratulating his right hon. Friend on the very satisfactory state of affairs which he had been able to bring under their notice that evening.

MR. TORRENS said, that he also would offer his congratulations to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India on the very satisfactory statement he had made on that occasion; but he could not help regretting that it should be submitted to their notice at so very late a period of the Session. He was aware that that was occasioned by the period up to which the accounts were made up in India; but he could not see any reason why these accounts should not be closed at the end of December or November instead of April, which would allow the right hon. Gentleman to make his statement about the same time as the Chancellor of the Exchequer was making his statement here. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be slow to act on the suggestion of the hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Vansittart), that the system of opium cultivation in Bengal should be assimilated to that in Malwa and the West of India. He should be sorry to see the ill-feeling which existed between the indigo planters and the ryots extended to the cultivation of opium. He did not think the matter of a gold coinage was so pressing as it had been represented to be, and he hoped that the Secretary of State, before taking any step with regard to it, would wait to receive suggestions from the local authorities. The right hon. Gentleman had adverted to the Act passed last year for throwing open certain civil appointments to persons not belonging to the covenanted service, and he seemed to speak favourably of that measure. But he (Mr. Torrens) believed that of the instances quoted by the right hon. Gentleman to exemplify the working of the Act, two at least were open to animadversion. In one case a gentleman of great local interest—brother-in-law to the Governor of Bombay—was put into an appointment contrary to the Act, and the right hon. Gentleman had thought proper to cancel the appointment. In another, a Native named Gopal Rao Hurry had been appointed to an assistant-judgeship at Ahmednuggur, and the appointment was so illegal that it was taken up by the High Court of Judicature, and the Government was obliged to cancel it. This Native, however, was put into another appointment, which gave rise to a memorial from the whole Civil Service there. He hoped that memorial would be sent home.

MR. GREGSON said, he quite concurred with the hon. Gentleman that it was desirable that the Indian accounts should be brought down to a later date; and he thought that by the employment of an additional staff at Calcutta that might be done. He also thought it desirable that the accounts should be closed on the 31st December instead of the 30th April. With regard to the opium question he entirely disagreed from the right hon. Gentleman, for he thought that the opium system of Bengal should be assimilated to that of the Western Provinces. He thought the monopoly of the opium trade by the Government of Bengal was injurious and ought to be abolished. He heartily congratulated the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State on the flourishing condition of the Indian revenue, as he had laid it before the House that evening. India had had three prosperous years in succession; and the Indian Treasury had been enabled not only to reduce the debt £8,000,000 but there was £19,000,000 in the Trea-surey. This was a highly satisfactory statement. But he perceived that the increase of revenue to the amount of £1,600,000 was from opium; but opium revenue was a precarious and dangerous source of income to rely upon. The increase upon the land revenue was in every respect satisfactory. But he did not think that the Indian finances had yet been put on an unexceptionable footing. The tax on salt was oppressively high. Salt was essential to the health of a population that lived chiefly on vegetable food, and he would therefore urge upon his right hon. Friend the propriety of reducing the tax at the earliest possible moment. He did not believe that the revenue would ultimately suffer by the reduction—on the contrary, he believed it would be rather increased than diminished. But in order to effect any good, the change must not be made in any niggardly spirit. The tax was at present from 1,800 to 2,000 per cent on the value of the article, and the diminution in the cost if the tax were reduced to a moderate amount would be certain to produce a vastly increased consumption. He thought there were many grounds on which the right hon. Gentleman might take into favourable consideration the introduction of a gold currency into India; nor did he think it would be attended with those difficulties the right hon. Gentleman anticipated. There was already a gold coin in India, but it was not in general circulation. He thought that the introduction of a more portable medium of exchange than silver would be received with favour. In conclusion, he congratulated the right hon. Gentleman and the House on the growing prosperity of India. It was a little more than one hundred years ago that the tragedy of the Black Hole occurred—now we reigned over nearly 200,000,000 of people, whom our Government had raised to a great degree of material prosperity. He believed that the whole of the intelligent Natives of India were well satisfied with our Government. Such indeed had been the improvement effected of late years in the moral and intellectual well being of the Indians, that he thought in course of time they might be trusted to govern themselves.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that at present he was hardly sanguine enough to believe in an Indian surplus; but, however that might be, the Secretary of State would do well to bring forward this question a little earlier in the Session, so that there might be a creditable debate and a fair audience. He did not object to the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman, except the sixth, in which there appeared to be a mistake of £2,000,000. [SIR CHARLES WOOD: It is a misprint; instead of £5,383,285, the figures should be £7,383,285.] When the revenue was £46,000,000 and the expenditure £45,750,000, it could not be said that a margin was left. Some £16,000,000 or £17,000,000 out of the revenue was gone, being bespoke as interest of debt, allowances, obligations under treaties, and expenses of collection, which according to his estimate amounted to nearly £6,250,000. Under our present system a deficit was just as likely to happen as a surplus. The cost of the army was very large, for in the last three years this charge had amounted to £37,000,000—nearly as large as the army expenditure for the United Kingdom. He wished to know what had been the expenses thrown upon the Indian revenue by the necessity of doing justice to the officers of the Indian army. The prophecies of those who deprecated the amalgamation had been fulfilled, and it seemed that having made the blunder and given the guarantee, the Natives of India were now being made "to pay the piper." He should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would give some explanation of the state of this account at the present time. Did he understand that the late war with the Hill Tribes had cost only £150,000?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that was the estimated cost, but in order to cover contingencies a sum of £200,000 had been taken.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY could only say that the war had been a very cheap one; but he presumed that this was the extraordinary expenditure. The whole proceeding was rather in the nature of a blunder, and the war might have been avoided if the proper steps had been taken in the first instance. However, he did hope that we were not going to engage in another war with this wild people, and that we should be able to check the Hill Tribes, leaving their country alone, and thus avoiding the little wars which destroyed the Indian surplus from year to year. Nothing was to be got by attacking them, but they were very good shots and might give our troops a good deal of trouble. This was not the time to enter into the gold currency question, and it had recently been discussed in that House; but with regard to the salt tax, the Government should deal with it with great caution. It was necessary to consult the prejudices of the Natives. It was difficult to find a tax that they were willing to pay, but they would pay taxes to which they had been accustomed. Though the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mr. Gregson) hoped that the people of India would pay the income tax, he must say he agreed with Mahomedans and Hindoos in thinking the tax extremely abominable. He should, therefore, be glad to find that the Government did not press that tax on India. But, on the other hand, bearing in mind that there were not many means of obtaining revenue from the Indian people, he thought that the salt tax ought to be approached with the greatest caution.

COLONEL SYKES said, that no doubt the financial administration of Indian affairs by the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary for India, had been surrounded with a bright halo during the last few years, but all the rays of this crown of glory could hardly be said to emanate from the brilliant administration of the right hon. Gentleman, for many of them were traceable to the Government of the East India Company. The right hon. Gentleman boasted of the increase of land revenue; but that was the result of the establishment by the Court of Directors of a permanent system of taxation, which stimulated the Natives to lay out their money to extend their cultivation, with the certainty of themselves reaping the profit. The next statement the right hon. Gentleman made was, that the cash balances were in such a good state as enabled him to pay off a considerable amount of debt; and the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mr. Gregson) talked of the cash balances being £19,000,000. According to Sir Charles Trevelyan's last Report for the years 1863-4, the cash balances instead of being £19,000,000 were only £14,000,000; but in 1857—that was before the Mutiny broke out, and under the administration of the East India Company—they amounted to £15,389,000, and the Indian Government were then enabled to pay off a 5 per cent loan. He understood his right hon. Friend to say that the employment of Natives in judicial administration was a new thing within the last five years. [Sir CHARLES WOOD explained that what he stated was that Natives had for the first time been put into high class judgeships.] He approved that step, but, with respect to the administration of justice, it was the fact before that 98 cases out of 100 were adjudicated on by Natives, as he (Colonel Sykes) had shown by publishing the official consecutive Judicial Returns for twelve years for all India. He gave the right hon. Gentleman credit for putting Natives into high places, but they were Princes and Royal personages that were so appointed; and they, no doubt, considered it to be a great honour to be associated with their governors; but they were not the persons best acquainted with administration, and he wished to know whether it would not be more advantageous if persons of a lower class with greater administrative ability were made members of these Councils? The right hon. Gentleman was, moreover, inconsistent in exercising his power in the appointment of Natives to office, in not allowing the employment of Natives in the medical service in India, notwithstanding that some Natives had come to this country to be educated at their own expense, and on examination had been rewarded with gold medals and full diplomas. He hoped such men would be included in the new medical service about to be established in India. He would not now touch on the still continued wrongs of the officers of the Indian army, in violation of Acts of Parliament, as there was no doubt that that question must be distinctly mooted next Session. The imports into India, though the House would scarcely believe it, had actually fallen off. According to Sir Charles Trevelyan's Report the Customs duty in 1861-2 was £2,876,139; but in the regular estimate for 1863-4 it was only £2,324,200, and the estimate for the next year was still less. On the other hand the exports had enormously increased, rendering the settlement of the balance of trade annually more difficult. The revenue from opium fluctuated greatly year by year. The Chinese were the only consumers of the drug, and what was the state of that country? Anarchy reigned throughout the land, and England had lent her aid to aggravate the desolation. They could not, therefore, look upon opium as a permanent source of revenue, but must be prepared for a time when it would, to a considerable extent, break down. In Bengal there was a vicious Government monopoly. The farmer had not control over his own land, for he was obliged to cultivate opium on a fixed portion of it, and sell the produce to the Government, who bought it at a low and sold it at a very high rate. That was neither a sound nor a creditable system. On the Bombay side of India an Excise duty was imposed on opium, and its cultivation was left to the discretion of the people. There was a great deal of talk about developing the resources of India; but the fact was that they had already been developed to such an extent that the balance of trade was annually increasing against us. We required Indian productions—indigo, sugar, cotton, oil seeds, jute, flax, &c., and must have them; but the people of India did not want our woollens or warming-pans. The demand for their products was increasing year by year, and we were obliged to pay for them in hard cash. Since 1800, by a Return which he (Colonel Sykes) had moved for, it appeared that the amount of silver and gold which has been introduced into India was £254,000,000 sterling. No part of this sum had come back again, or was likely to come, seeing that it could be lent at from 10 to 30 per cent. It was absurd to talk of the people burying their money, for they were much too acute to do that when they could get 20 or 30 per cent for it. His right hon. Friend, in his review of Indian progress, had not included the financial movements of 1863-4, which must be in his possession, as he (Colonel Sykes) held an official paper on the subject in his hand, and these figures would have been more acceptable than those of former years.

MR. BAZLEY said, he joined with every other Member who had spoken in regretting that the Budget had not been brought forward earlier in the Session. An impression was growing in the public mind that there was a disposition to carry on the Government of India irrespective of the control of Parliament. If, as had been proposed, the accounts for the year were submitted to Parliament at a proper time, very valuable suggestions, no doubt, would be made in the course of the discussions, the result of which might be of great benefit to the Indian Government. He wished, however, he could congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the services of the Government in regard to the cultivation of cotton in India, and its increased supply; but on the part of his friends in Manchester he had to complain that the Indian Government had interfered in the affairs of the Manchester Cotton Company in such a way that that concern had been reduced to comparative ruin. In describing the prosperity of India, the right hon. Gentleman was wanting in candour in omitting to state that the surplus price of cotton remitted to India at the present time amounted to little less than £50,000,000. But how were the Indian Government requiring Lancashire for the excessive price they were paying for cotton? Why this was the very moment which was chosen for enforcing increased exactions on Manchester goods to the amount of 100 or 150 per cent, taking into account the high value of cotton. Such was the dissatisfaction in Manchester that a claim was raised not merely for a reduction of the duty on cotton manufactures, but for the admission of Lancashire goods into India free of duty. The practical effect was that the Lancashire manufacturers were carrying on very extensive works at a great pecuniary loss. There were individual establishments contributing to the revenue of India as much as £100 per week in the duties levied, which were about to be mulcted in £200 or £300 a week, thus, of course, adding to the losses they already sustained. It was cheering to learn from the hon. Member for London (Mr. Crawford) that an improved quality of cotton was now being received from India. He had never doubted that that country might be made to grow cotton which would not only compete with but even supersede the American supply; but it was of great importance that a superior quality of fibre should be cultivated in India. If, while the Indian supply was in its present condition, the American supply were suddenly to be restored, the manufacturers would prefer the latter, and the result would be that all the efforts that had been made in India during the last few years would be thrown away. Every effort ought, therefore, to be made to raise the character of the cotton which was produced in India. He trusted that next Session more time would be given to the discussion of Indian affairs.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that they were met together on the 21st of July for the purpose of re-enacting the solemn farce which last year was performed on the 23rd of July. After a Session passed in laborious discussions, a mere fragment of the House of Commons met for the purpose of deliberating upon the Government of more than 200,000,000 of people. A more scandalous sight could not be presented to the British nation than the aspect of the House at that moment. The Government of 200,000,000 of people was confided to their care, and yet the welfare of that enormous population was muttered over to Benches almost empty. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman was to some extent encouraging, as it showed that the natural resources of the country, assisted by that Providential interposition which generally came to our aid when we had committed great blunders, had raised the revenue of India to a paying point. He, therefore, trusted that the Government of India would feel inclined to treat the two services in India with more liberality than they had hitherto displayed. It had been remarked that evening that the Speaker had heralded the finale of the labours of the Session by his annual dinner, and he (Sir James Elphinstone) therefore felt justified in calling this a post-prandial discussion of a subject that was worthy of greater respect and attention by the House. By a formal decision of the House it had been declared that those services were entitled to consideration, and he gave the right hon. Gentleman fair warning, that if the subject was not satisfactorily dealt with or explained by the right hon. Gentleman, that at the beginning of the next Session the subject would be forced upon the attention of the Government and the sense of the House again taken upon it. The revenue and expenditure of India which they were now discussing were matters of history, and debates of this kind simply converted the House of Commons into a debating society for expressing opinions upon India in general. He was glad to hear that the Government had at length adopted the recommendation of the Committee, to transport our troops to India by the way of the Red Sea, rather than by the Cape. This was a course so consistent with common sense and economy the marvel was that the Government did not see the advantage of it before. He wished to ask on whom the expense for providing the passage of those troops from England to Alexandria was to fall, and whether this country or India was to provide the transports from England to Alexandria? He hoped that the Government of India had duly considered the periods of the year when the health of the troops would be seriously endangered by their transit. At the fall of the Nile fever set in, which lasted for three months afterwards, and therefore the troops should not be sent to India by this overland route between the months of June and November. Now that there was extensive railway communication in India it was time for the Government to look before them, and to consider seriously whether a reduction in the Indian establishments could not be effected. Sir Sidney Cotton — a most able and experienced authority — stated with those means of communication with India they could govern India with 30 per cent less of troops than they had heretofore thought necessary to have there; but that could only be done by the abandonment of the old system of cantonments, which was now entirely obsolete, and by availing themselves of the facilities afforded by the extension of the railway system. He recommended the Secretary of the Colonies to consider whether a similar course might not be advantageously pursued in the colonies for the development of railway communication. There was, however, one point to which the attention of the Government of India did not appear to have been sufficiently turned. The whole of our efforts for the last few years had been directed to the development of the internal traffic of India. No doubt that was of paramount importance, but in order to render it effectual it was also necessary to give increased facilities for the coasting trade of India. Much had been said about the scarcity of labour in India; he did not believe there was any such scarcity. No doubt the higher portions of the country were more sparsely inhabited than the alluvial portions of the country. The lines of communication which were now established in India appeared to be intended more for the transport of the products and commodities of the country than for the purpose of supplying food to the population; if the Government afforded proper facilities for conveying labour from one part of the country to another all the difficulty would cease. Three years ago he obtained a Committee to investigate the possibility and practicability of deepening a channel through Adam's Bridge, connecting the Continent of India with the Island of Ceylon, so as to enable large ships to go through the passage instead of going round the Island. There were between 3,000 and 4,000 yards of ground requiring to be cut through, but the work was not greater than was met with in any ten miles of railway out of London, and it was most important with regard to the coasting trade of India. According to the evidence taken by that Committee it was quite clear that £100,000 or £150,000 was all that was necessary to open that channel for a line-of-battle ship. He asked the right hon. Gentleman whether any steps had been taken to open up that channel? The present extra expense of the coasting trade, arising from the necessity of taking a 350 miles' voyage for one year, would pay for the canal and enable the Princess Royal, the flag ship of the station, to sail through the Straits. Materials of excellent quality were on the spot, and the surplus which the right hon. Gentleman had in hand would enable him to carry out that improvement. We had peace in India, and revenue was springing up. The East India Company was constantly at war, coerced into it by the Board of Control; and when the Company had taken the chesnuts out of the fire they were set aside, and the right hon. Gentleman took credit for the present state of things. Another point on which he desired to have information was who paid for the British navy in India? The coasts of India were about 4,000 miles in extent, from Beloochistan to Singapore, and the whole police of these seas was managed by the Royal Navy. One of the first acts of the right hon. Gentleman was to extinguish the Indian navy. The Indian navy comprised more scientific men, for its numbers, than any other service in the world, excepting a strictly scientific service like the Royal Engineers. They were employed as ambassadors, diplomatists, residents, consuls; they explored countries, they investigated the ruins and antiquities of the country; they were linguists, surveyors, admirable seamen, and they maintained a post of the highest respectability and honour under the East India Company, and performed services of the very greatest importance in the survey and exploration of the country, not only of the East India Company, but adjacent to the Red Sea and in Abyssinia. That service was swept away with scanty thanks or justice. He asked the right hon. Gentleman, out of his overflowing Budget, to temper justice with mercy, and to give the members of that profession some of the advantages which he was extending to the country which we had saved from anarchy and despotism. By what had that force been replaced? By the Royal Navy. And who paid the navy for this service? The taxpayers of England. Now, he would ask whether it was right that the taxpayers of England should send out a navy to do the business which should be done by the Indian Government, and enable the right hon. Gentleman to come down to the House with a flourishing statement about the revenues of India? Then, as to the alteration in the boundary between the East India Company's territory and the territories of the Crown. Formerly, when an officer passed the Cape of Good Hope, he came under Indian allowances. We had now established a command eastward of the Cape; we had established a naval command from the Cape of Good Hope to Singapore, where it joined the Chinese station. It was practically impossible to separate that portion of the sea from the territories of the Indian Government. The whole stream of our commerce went from the narrow neck round the Cape of Good Hope to the Southern Indian Ocean, and there ought to commence the subsidy of the Indian Government for the navy, and it was a practical injustice to this country to make it otherwise. It was a direct premium to the Admiral for spending the whole of his time in the Indian portion of his station. He wished to know how the right hon. Gentleman intended to deal with these matters. He understood that an important alteration was to take place with regard to the States Settlements, and he wished to know in what that change was to consist. When Sir Stamford Raffles established the colony of Singapore in 1819, it was guaranteed as a free port. He (Sir James Elphinstone) was there in the year 1820, and he had been there occasionally during the next seventeen years. A more extraordinary increase in any port had never occurred, except in some of the mushroom places in America, than took place at Singapore. The whole of the trade of the Eastern Archipelago had been centred in that port, and the progress of the colony was mainly due to its immunity from all port charges. He understood that it was the design of the Indian Government to introduce port regulations for Singapore. He wished to know whether or not that was really the intention of the Government; because, if so, that opportunity might be obtained in the next Session which was denied him in the present of opposing a policy likely to be so mischievous. Then, as to the taxes in India, and especially the salt tax. He looked upon the cotton cultivation in India as ephemeral. The war in America must, in the nature of things, end some time or other. There were in the South 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 of slaves, and half a million would be quite enough to supply this country with all the cotton it required.

The total destruction of the animals in Egypt had altered the position of that country, and instead of exporting large quantities of grain, Egypt was likely to become a great cotton field, and to import grain for its own consumption from the Black Sea. Under these circumstances, was it likely that we should take our cotton from a country 16,000 miles distant when we could get it from America and Egypt? India, no doubt, had benefited from the war in America, and as long as it pleased Providence that the war should continue India would be likely to benefit. But as soon as it came to an end the people of this country would fall back upon their old sources of supply. But since the people of India must consume a certain quantity of salt with their food, the salt tax, in his opinion, and in the opinion of those best acquainted with India, was the last tax with which the Government ought to interfere. He felt bound to enter his protest against the system inaugurated by the right hon. Gentleman of bringing forward his financial statement, when he might have acted far otherwise, at a time when the benches of that House were so empty. He should have been glad to see the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) present on that occasion. It was the proper function of an Opposition not to allow questions of such importance to be slurred over as they were that evening, and he hoped the House would support him next year when he should endeavour to bring about a better state of things.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, that of all the wonderful political performances ever enacted on this terrestrial globe, the most astounding was the performance of the right hon. Gentleman. It was not merely that the Indian Budget was brought in at the end of the Session, when they were all wearied and jaded, but that they were wearied and jaded from listening not to a speech, for it could not be called a speech, but to a sort of concatenation of broken, interjectional remarks and sentences, jerked out by a Minister to whom Heaven had denied not only the power of lucid statement but almost the gift of articulate speech. ["Oh, oh!"] Assuredly the noble Lord at the head of the Government could find a colleague who, while not inferior to the right hon. Gentleman in administrative ability, might possess the power, he would not say of laying before the House such a statement as that which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was in the habit of making from year to year with regard to the financial position of England, but a person who could make that sort of clear and intelligible statement which the country had a right to demand. ["Oh, oh!"] He had listened year after year to the speeches of the right hon. Baronet, and he had never heard him make a speech which would be in any respect satisfactory, even if it appeared as an anonymous article in the pages of a Quarterly Review.

MR. AYRTON said, with regard to what had been said of the state of the House, he believed these Indian debates followed only the ordinary course of such matters, and if there was any peculiarity in this debate it was to be found in the circumstance that there was an almost entire absence of all the Members connected with the manufacturing districts who had ever taken an interest in the affairs of India. The only two persons present who could be said to represent the manufacturing districts were the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bazley) and the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith), and they had expressed themselves as satisfied on the whole with the state of affairs. He attributed the peculiarity to which he had alluded to the circumstance that from repeated discussion they had arrived at a better appreciation of the relations of this country to our Indian Empire, and they felt that the causes of complaint upon which they had formerly dwelt had ceased to exist. They no longer looked for that enormous supply of cotton which they had formerly anticipated, nor did they attribute the deficiency to the causes of which they had so often complained. While regret had been generally expressed that the House had not before it the financial statement delivered by Sir Charles Trevelyan to the Indian Council in the beginning of the financial year, an hon. Gentleman spoke of it disparagingly, and said that it had sent every Member of the Council to sleep, except Sir Charles Trevelyan, who was reading it. He (Mr. Ayrton), on the contrary, had received a copy of that statement, and he must say he considered it as deserving to be spoken of with the utmost respect, and that it reflected the highest credit upon Sir Charles Trevelyan. In former years some gentlemen went out to India with the most inflated ideas of their position; they called themselves Chancellors of the Exchequer, and delivered speeches which were not worthy of being reproduced in this country and of being laid in an official form upon the table of the House. But there was a total absence of any such assumption on the part of Sir Charles Trevelyan.* Considering the tone of Sir Charles Trevelyan's address, he was of opinion that some arrangement should be made by which such a document should be laid upon the table of the House by the Secretary of State for India; not that the document should be looked upon as binding the Secretary of State to everything contained in it, but merely as an expression of the opinion of the Government of India on the finances of that empire. It was most unsatisfactory that they should be passing Resolutions relating to a state of affairs past and gone when Sir Charles Trevelyan had published a statement which brought the finances of India up to the April of the present year, and estimated them to the April of 1865, and had added a financial criticism relative to the increase or diminution of the income and expenditure of that country. He thought that with such information the House would be able to arrive at a better conclusion than by merely receiving the accounts which had been laid upon the table. It was not his intention to enter into discussions extending from the Himalaya to Adam's Peak, and from the chronicles of Adam to the present time; but he could not help recalling the attention of the Secretary of State to a subject which he had brought to his notice last year, and which showed a tendency on the part of the Government of India to fall into the evil course into which the Home Government had fallen. A hundred years ago it was predicted that if the Government of this country could raise a revenue from the vices of the people by the spread of intemperance, they would address themselves to promote the consumption of ardent spirits rather than to diminish it, and that prophecy has been thoroughly fulfilled. He thought there was a disposition on the part of the Government of India to fall into the same error. Nothing could equal the horrors produced by stimulating the consumption of intoxicating drinks in India, and it became the Government seriously to consider whether some improvement could not be introduced into this system. He must also again press on the right hon. Gentleman the condition of the salt revenue. That revenue had been raised very much during the last few years; and while every step taken in the remission of revenue was for the relief of the wealthy classes in India, they were putting on a tax on the first necessary of life for the poorer classes. The increase of the salt tax had been attended with the most deplorable results. Those who are engaged in the curing of provisions had been compelled to reduce the quantity used, and the most lamentable evils, involving loss of life, had been the consequence. Serious effects had also been occasioned to cattle and agriculture. He was quite satisfied that the present amount of this tax was oppressive and ought to be reduced at the earliest possible period. With regard to expenditure, it was unnecessary to go into all the items that appeared in these accounts. He feared very little could be done in reducing the expenditure on account of the army and civil service. But there was one thing for which Sir Charles Trevelyan deserved the greatest credit. Instead of lending himself to the views of a few people in India who were desirous of carrying on a false system of finance, he had boldly applied himself to the proper appropriation of the surplus Indian revenue to the reduction of the public debt. That surplus had been created by factitious finance, and the debt ought never to have been created. Still, there had been a pressure put on the Government that the surplus should be applied to develop the resources of the country and the maintenance of a false system of finance. Every encouragement should be given to the Finance Minister in India in resisting that pressure. He had been placed in a position of the greatest possible difficulty, being surrounded by persons who fancied that the interests of India were coincident with their own, though these might be limited to the province or towns in which they resided, and by no means identical with the interests of the great mass of people for whose good government we ought to feel ourselves responsible. He thought the statement which had been made exceedingly gratifying. India was prosperous, notwithstanding the misfortunes of the Mutiny and in consequence of the war in America. Immense capital had been invested in India by the railway companies. There had been a vast increase in the value of its produce, which had tended to bring the finances of India into a more healthy condition. But he hoped it would not be thought, because we could collect revenue from a submissive people we should exact from them the last farthing they could pay short of driving them into rebellion, and that we were entitled to squander that revenue on anything that gratified the caprice of Europeans. They were now congratulating themselves on the great prosperity of India; but he would remind them that a few years ago Lord Dalhousie printed a Minute, in which he congratulated himself and the country on the prosperity which had resulted from his system of administration; and all concerned in that Minute—the Court of Directors, the Board of Control, and the Public Service in India—were extremely delighted by that state of things. But when the record came home it was found to be a factitious statement, and twelve months afterwards we were awakened by the astounding discovery that the statement was mere imagination; and that underlying our administration was a deep sense of injury and wrong, a growing state of dissatisfaction which burst out into open mutiny and sedition. Government would do well to consider what was the real state of India, and not build too much on the force they possessed, and the submissiveness of the people, for if they did, deriding Native prejudice and superstition, and exacting from the people the utmost farthing they could pay, without breaking out into open rebellion, the time would come when this country would be more startled than before, and would regret that it had not taken advantage of the pacific and humble disposition of the Natives of India.

SIR CHARLES WOOD was very much obliged for the views which had been expressed on this subject by hon. Gentlemen who had spoken in the debate, and the kind expressions which had been used towards himself. It had been stated by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir James Elphinstone) that the Indian Budget had been postponed, as a dodge on his part, till so late a period that he might be enabled to make what sort of statement he pleased. Now, the real facts of the case were these—till he became President of the Board of Control no Indian Budget was ever laid before the House, and no more information about the affairs of India was placed before the House than of any part of the world with which we had no connection. He could therefore hardly be accused with justice of wishing to keep the House in ignorance of Indian affairs. But how much earlier could he make his statement? The accounts on the table, up to the end of April, 1863, were made up in India in March and April, 1864. The regular Estimates for 1863-4 were made up about the same time, and did not arrive in this country till towards the end of April. The form of the accounts had been settled by the House of Commons, and the day on which they must be laid on the table was fixed by Act of Parliament. That day was the 14th of May. Generally speaking, they could not be laid on the table more than a day or two before the time fixed by Act of Parliament. The accounts were laid on the table before Whitsuntide this year, and they were of such a detailed character that they could not be printed before the middle of June. No doubt it might be possible to change the whole arrangement of business in India and to alter the date of the Indian year, which had been fixed for the convenience of India, and not of this country. He might by this means be able to make his statement about India at an earlier period of the Session. The House must see that it was a matter of perfect indifference to him whether he made that statement on the 1st of January or the 1st of July. But the financial year in England had been changed from the end of December to the end of March in order that the votes for the great services might be got through before Easter. If even one night were taken for the Indian Budget before Easter it would interrupt the course of business in that House, and it was, therefore, necessary to appoint such a day as would least interfere with English business. The House of Commons, however, did not vote the taxes of India, nor did it in the first instance control the expenditure of India. The object of the statement now made annually by the Indian Minister was to lay before the House the general state of affairs in India and to enable those hon. Members who took an interest in Indian matters to make such suggestions or ask for such information as might be useful. The House was asked for no vote that influenced the taxes of India. He had listened with great attention to the various suggestions which had been made; but if he adopted the suggestions of some hon. Gentleman he should have very little surplus left. He had never thought it desirable to maintain a high duty on salt; but when recommendations of its reduction were made, hon. Members must think of the present state of Indian revenue. The surplus in India was estimated at £30,000; but there were miscellaneous receipts in England that brought it up to £257,000. It must be remembered in how large a degree the Indian revenue depended on opium, the income from which sometimes varied as much as £1,000,000 a year or even more, and how difficult it would be to make up any possible deficiency which might not improbably occur in that source. The evils of the salt tax had been, he thought, a good deal overrated, for he remembered a report from a medical officer attached to a hospital in Calcutta who examined his patients on this subject, and found that out of 100 persons only three said that they had ever suffered from the diminished quantity of salt which they were able to consume in consequence of the high price. The land revenue was a rent, and not a tax, and the only taxes the Natives of India paid were Customs duties on piece goods for clothing and the tax on salt. The people of India had always been accustomed to taxes on salt. They had a singular objection to a new tax, and it would therefore be most unwise to repeal the salt tax which had always existed in India, and substitute some other impost which the people of India had never paid before. It could not be said that the people of India were too heavily taxed. With regard to opium, he was ready to admit that the pass duty on Bombay opium was at present too high, and that it would be well that it should bear a fairer proportion to the amount of duty at Calcutta. The hon. Member (Mr. Henry Seymour) had not correctly understood the state of the case in regard to waste lands. What he (Sir Charles Wood) had stated, and that was on the authority of Lord Canning, was that he did not think a large amount would be available for sale in Bengal Proper; but that in Assam and the Neilgherries there was a good deal of waste land available for European cultivation. With reference to the telegraph, he did not see that he had been at all to blame. The Turkish Government insisted upon constructing the line in Turkey, and the Persian Government upon constructing that in Persia. He had completed all that depended upon himself, and had assisted those Governments as far as they would allow him in constructing the lines which passed through their respective territories. The complaints of the hon. Members for Stockport and Manchester as to the valuation of piece goods at Calcutta were not well founded. The duty was 5 per cent ad valorem, and as the value of the goods had risen, it was only fair that the rate at which they were charged should be increased. That had been done in concert with the Chamber of Commerce at Calcutta, which admitted that it was perfectly fair. The hon. Member for Stockport charged him with bad political economy in doing with reference to tea and the cinchona—that is to say, encouraging the introduction of those articles of produce—that which he refused to do with regard to cotton; but the hon. Member forgot that all that he was doing in the former cases had been done with regard to cotton ten or fifteen years ago by the East India Company, who, having introduced the best description of cotton and shown that it could be grown, handed the plantations over to private enterprise. Upon the subject of the duty on saltpetre, a letter had that morning passed the Council, and was about to be sent to the Government of India, informing them that saltpetre was being manufactured in Europe to a considerable amount from nitrate of soda, a fact which bore most importantly upon the duty, the existing rate of which was only justifiable upon the theory that India had a monopoly of the article. The inconvenience which had arisen at the mint of Bombay arose from the circumstance that in October last, there being then no bullion to coin, the old machinery was taken down for the purpose of substituting new and improved engines. While the establishment was in this crippled condition there came an extraordinary influx of bullion, which, of course, could not be immediately coined into money. The hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham had found fault with him for not going more minutely into the estimates of revenue and expenditure. On former occasions he had done so—in fact, had made an Indian Budget; and he had only omitted to take that course on the present occasion because the experience of the last year or two had induced him to think that it rather bored than interested the House. The speech of Sir Charles Trevelyan was not an official document, and therefore could not conveniently be laid upon the table. He did not quite understand what the hon. Baronet meant by doubting the existence of a surplus. So far as last year went, the surplus was an ascertained fact. That of the current year was, of course, only anticipated, and might or might not be realized; but he had confidence in Sir Charles Trevelyan's judgment on this point.

There must always be some uncertainty as to opium. As to the transport of troops, arrangements were now under consideration, in concert with the Admiralty, for sending them through Egypt. He was not so sure as he was at one time that the adoption of that course would lead to any considerable saving of expense, because the cost of building transports had been found to be much greater than had been anticipated. The troops would certainly be sent during the cool months of the year. Various suggestions had been made as to new taxes, but upon the whole he was inclined to believe that Indian finance could be better administered on the spot than by suggestions in that House. With respect to charges for the navy he would only observe that the external defence of India had always depended upon the Imperial forces, and the Indian navy was hardly more than a transport service. A question had been put about the Straits settlement which he scarcely understood.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, what he wanted to know was, Whether Singapore was to cease to be a free port, or whether duties were to be levied there by the authority of the Indian Government?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, no alteration in the position of Singapore was intended; but questions had been raised by the Singapore Chamber of Commerce as to harbourmasters, and also as to moorings, and it was stated that no objection would be made to the levying of some small duty for the purpose of defraying any expenditure for these purposes. He believed that he had noticed all the points that had been raised, and had only further to thank the Committee for the patient attention they had given to his statement, and to thank hon. Members for the suggestions which they had made, and which he could assure them should receive his most careful attention.

MR. TORRENS wanted to know, whether there was any probability of the plan he had suggested being adopted—namely, to close the Indian accounts at an earlier date—say the 31st of December?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he would communicate with the Government of India upon that subject, but he would remark that, even if he were enabled to bring forward the accounts earlier in the Session, he should not be able to make his statement earlier without interfering with the English business. The accounts before the Committee were for the year ending the 30th of April, 1863. The local accounts might be made up earlier in India, but the accounts for all India were not made up until March, and did not reach this country till the middle of April.

MR. TORRENS said, the accounts of India were closed on the 30th April—he could not see why they could not be made up to December 31, or to any preceding date, so that they might be laid before Parliament early in the Session. He had great experience himself in relation to those accounts, and could see no obstacle to the plan he suggested.

SIR CHARLES WOOD admitted that the hon. Gentleman was better acquainted with the subject than himself, but he had spoken of the delay of arranging all the local accounts at Calcutta before reaching this country.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE thought that all the right hon. Gentleman had to do was to send out an order that the accounts should be made up to a particular day. With respect to the expenditure for barracks, he hoped attention would be given to that subject, as most of them were unhealthy and even pestilential; and if the Government would take the opinion of such men as Sir Sidney Cotton, they would soon learn where improvements were needed, and whether it would not be possible to do with some 20,000 or 30,000 less Europeans than were now kept in India. Then as to the Paumban Channel, he thought the expenditure of some £200,000 would be a most useful application of money, as it would greatly facilitate trade, and a small duty upon coasters would soon recoup the outlay.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, that Sir Charles Trevelyan had made a statement in India of the estimate for next year, and yet the House was kept in ignorance upon the subject until the moment when the right hon. Gentleman spoke, and even then they were only informed of the general items, though the full accounts had been published in India. As to the home charges, that part of the accounts must be sent out from England; and why could it not be laid before the House? He complained also that the accounts which they had contained no column comparing the accounts with those of the previous year. The statement of Sir Charles Trevelyan was an explanation of the estimate of this year.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that if

his hon. Friend would look at the papers which had been laid upon the table he would find that the accounts for 1862-3 were actually compared, page after page, with the estimated expenditure for the year 1863-4.

MR. GREGSON said, he had not asked for the repeal of the salt duty, but for the reduction of it.

In reply to Sir HENRY WILLOUGHBY,

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that measures were being taken to consolidate various treasuries, which were now unnecessarily multiplied.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE gave notice that if the naval service was not placed on the same footing as the military service by next Session he should move the rejection of the Resolution.

Resolutions agreed to.

House resumed.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: In moving that you, Sir, do now leave the Chair, I wish, with the permission of the House, to take the same course which I adopted last year, and that is to check—which I hope to be able to do in a few words—the figures set down in this Bill by a comparison with those I gave in the financial statement—to show the difference between the sums estimated and the sums as they actually stand; in fact, to place before the House the rectified statement. Since that statement was made certain changes have taken place in consequence of Supplemental Estimates which it has been found necessary to lay on the table. The charges on account of the Debt and the Consolidated Fund remain as they were. The charge for the Army, too, stands precisely as they were then stated. One of the most important changes is in the charge for the Navy, which in the financial statement was set down at £10,432,000, and is in the Appropriation Bill fixed at £10,708,000—thus making a difference of nearly £280,000. Of that sum about £60,000 was announced by me in general terms in connection with the changes which were then under consideration in the pay of certain classes in the navy, and a reserve of £80,000 was actually made, principally for that purpose. Independently of that, however, there has been another most important additional charge imposed on account of the service—I allude to the purchase of the two iron-clad vessels of which we have heard so much, and for which a sum, I think, of £225,000 was voted by this House. These charges will explain the difference between the estimate of £10,432,000 and the sum of £10,708,000, as stated in this Bill. Again, the Miscellaneous Expenditure was estimated by me at £7,628,000, whereas it appears here as £7,638,000. On the other hand the Packet Service, which was estimated to cost £883,000, has had actually voted for it only £860,000. Taking the entire of the changes made altogether, the result is as follows:—I estimated the Revenue for the present financial year at £67,128,000, and the Expenditure at £66,890,000, showing a surplus of £238,000; but while the estimate for the Revenue remains as I placed it—inasmuch as the financial proposals of the Government were adopted substantially as they were submitted to the House—the estimate of charge has been raised to £67,073,000, leaving on the figures as they now stand only a nominal surplus of £55,000. I do not think there is any reason to apprehend that there will be a deficiency on the balance of the year; but, at the same time, the estimated surplus has been reduced to a sum smaller than the Government would have been justified in submitting for the sanction of the House had they contemplated the additional charges which I have mentioned at the period of the financial statement. Almost the whole of the difference is caused by the purchase of these two vessels; and that is not to be regarded as a measure of finance as a measure of expediency for the protection of the public interest. It is possible—and, indeed, I hope not unreasonable—to express some confidence that the effect of the purchase of these vessels will be the reduction in the corresponding Votes of next year; but I am not able to give any definite estimate of the reduction upon these Votes in the present year, though I do not altogether abandon the hope of so doing. These, therefore, are the figures which express the ultimate finance of the year, and as far as the estimate of Revenue and Expenditure goes they show only a nominal surplus of £55,000.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, it was clear that the surplus had more than vanished; but he wished to know whether there were not other charges to be deducted? Had the right hon. Gentleman taken into consideration the Supplemental Estimate for the Army, the charges for the Yeomanry, and the £20,000 for Sir Rowland Hill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the figures were taken from the Appropriation Bill as printed, and were therefore authentic.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY thought it was unfortunate that the surplus had all vanished, and hoped that the right hon. Gentleman could give the House some assurance that the revenue was in such a state of buoyancy that there was every reason to expect a fair surplus.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, as far as he could judge, was in a position to give such an assurance.

MR. WHITE wished to know if credit had been taken for the £500,000 which it was stated would be repaid to us by New Zealand if the House consented to the Guarantee of Loan Bill now before the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that if that sum were received it would go to increase the balance.

MR. WALPOLE said, he was glad to find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer anticipated that the balance would be maintained if no other disturbances should arise. He could not help, however, looking with the greatest alarm at what was going on in New Zealand, and he thought it would well become the Government to make a fuller statement as to the charges which might be expected in case the war should continue.

MR. AYRTON wished to know if it was competent for any hon. Member to bring on any question under the Appropriation Act arising out of the Votes appropriated by the Bill, or whether it was necessary to wait for the particular section of the Act to which the question referred?

MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. and learned Member will be perfectly in order in proceeding with the notice which stands in his name.

MR. AYRTON said, he had given notice of his intention to call the attention of the House to the balance of power in Europe, for the maintenance of which most of the army supplies were voted. He said that one of the most important of the Votes was £15,000,000 which had been voted for the support of our standing army. In the Act which was passed at the commencement of the Session they were told that this standing army was supported for the purpose of defending our Colonies, for the safety of our own country, and for the maintenance of the balance of power in Europe. The amount voted for those purposes during the last five years was £84,000,000, so that, with the sums voted during the present Session, they had voted and were to spend no less a sum than £100,000,000 for those purposes. They had never been informed in what manner that enormous sum ought to be divided; how much for the protection of our Colonies, how much for ourselves, and how much for the balance of power; but if they were to divide it into three equal parts they would be able to appreciate the sacrifice which the people of this country were making for the attainment of some end of the nature of which they had no very clear idea. He had asked the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) a few days since a question which appeared to him to be of some importance, and he regarded the answer which he received as highly unsatisfactory. He had desired to know whether the Government had taken steps, in consequence of the course pursued by the kingdom of Prussia, to relieve this country from the responsibilities which it had incurred in 1815 towards that country; and the noble Lord by his answer suggested that he (Mr. Ayrton) was proposing a very gratuitous violation of treaty to which he could not lend his countenance. He regarded the view taken by the noble Lord as erroneous, because he did not look upon our withdrawal from the responsibilities of the treaty as a violation of our agreement if we believe that Prussia was now engaged in violating the treaty in essential conditions which affected the character of our guarantee. He might remind the House that during the great war which ended with the peace or treaty of 1815, Saxony took a very conspicuous part on the side of the French, and that the Great Napoleon always manifested the deepest interest in the welfare and maintenance of that kingdom. Saxony naturally became antagonistic to the other Powers of Germany, more especially to Austria and Prussia; and when Russia and ourselves had by dint of great sacrifices and exertions of power destroyed the supremacy of the French in Europe, Prussia became awakened, as it were, from the stupor into which she had fallen, and mustered up courage sufficient to take part in the conflict which resulted in the overthrow of Napoleon. But no sooner had the result been attained than Prussia, whose conduct resembled that of the jackal following in the footsteps of the lion, "eager to prey where she was powerless to conquer," assumed a remarkable attitude in the affairs of Europe, and immediately began to intrigue with Russia for the purpose of appropriating to herself the kingdom of Saxony. It required considerable diplomatic exertions on the part of England to frustrate these exertions; and ultimately Prussia was induced to relinquish some of her designs, and to content herself with the spoliation from Saxony of a portion of her territory. The result of these intrigues and negotiations was that England was induced to give a distinct guarantee, by the Treaty of Vienna, that Prussia should continue in possession of the provinces of which she had despoiled the kingdom of Saxony. That, I maintain, was a grave responsibility to incur, and one which we can only properly appreciate when we remember our insular position, and the fact that Saxony is situated in the heart of Europe. No doubt the conduct of this country was based upon the fact that we were making a great settlement which was to maintain the balance of power in Europe. But when Prussia accepted our guarantee she implicitly acknowledged that she was not strong enough to maintain her acquisitions by force without external aid. England in undertaking that guarantee must have felt and believed that she did so, not for the purpose of enabling Prussia to break the peace of Europe by attacking other States and countries, but in the conviction that Prussia was a peaceable Power, and that she would remain contented under the treaty which gave her so large an addition to her territory. The position, however, which Prussia had lately assumed was entirely at variance with the principles of the Treaty of Vienna. In these transactions we had been dealing with Prussia and Austria, not as part of the German Confederation, because they had been at some pains to impress upon us that they were acting as independent kingdoms in connection with the Germanic Confederation. Prussia could not screen herself by saying that she was merely performing a duty imposed on her by her obligations to the Diet. For her own aims she had chosen to act as an independent kingdom as well as one of the Confederate States of Germany, and in the attitude she had taken upon herself to break the peace of Europe. Under this very treaty the fundamental part of the Germanic Confederation was settled, and the article of guarantee was part of those provisions. Therefore the guarantee was an integral part of the territorial arrangements of the States of the Germanic Confederation in its internal and extra-territorial relations. It was equally clear by that treaty, Holstein alone was part of the Germanic Confederation, and that Schleswig had nothing to do with that arrangement. When Prussia therefore took on herself to invade Schleswig and Denmark Proper, she was entering on a course of proceeding entirely at variance with the Treaty of 1815, and was undertaking to break the peace of Europe, and unsettling the balance of power. He denied altogether the assertion of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) that the acts of 1863-4 had nothing to do with the Treaty of 1815. They were intimately connected with each other; because it was impossible for any man to say what might be the consequences of those acts of 1863-4 in reference to the responsibilities undertaken by us under the Treaty of 1815. If Prussia had proclaimed to-day that there was to be a kind of parochial nationality, and that each parish and hamlet was to be asked whether it would belong to one kingdom or another, that feeling might spread, and what had taken place in Schleswig might occur in Saxony. The history of Germany showed that there was as much antagonism between the Bavarian and Prussian, the Saxon and the Austrian, as between the Hanoverian, say, and the Schleswiger; and if this new principle was to be acted on and enforced by war, without negotiation, the Saxons might apply the lesson taught by Prussia, and rally together, and it was impossible to tell what we might not be called on to do under our responsibilities of the Treaty of 1815. It was beside the question, therefore, to compare our position under that treaty with the question raised under the Treaty of 1852, when our Government justly told Prussia that she could not take advantage of the circumstances which had occurred to depart from the Treaty of 1815. We were entitled to say to Prussia, that if she were not content to rest her claims on the Treaty of 1815, and would not preserve the peace guaranteed by that treaty, we would no longer accept the responsibilities of that treaty. Instead of indulging in idle threats which the Prussians knew we should never perform, if the Government at certain critical portions of the negotiations had made such representations to Prussia, she would have been stopped in her course; whereas we had rather encouraged her by bluster, which she knew perfectly well we should never act upon. He had felt it his duty to take this opportunity of protesting in the name of the people of England, who had spent £100,000,000 within the last six years for the preservation of the balance of power against the imposition of such an enormous burden in favour of the Treaty of Vienna, and in favour of a Power which showed herself utterly regardless of treaties, and which, for its own purposes, had not scrupled to break the peace of Europe.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON thought the House ought not to separate without some remarks being made on the altered position in which this country stood with regard to her engagements in Europe. There were treaties older than 1815, by which we were bound, which might prove highly inconvenient to us if the novel doctrines recently laid down were to be maintained. The hon. and learned Gentleman, however, need not feel much anxiety as to what we should do about the Treaty of 1815, when older and more solemn engagements had within a very recent period been utterly disregarded and set at naught. Within a very few years the noble Lord at the head of the Government had referred to the Treaty of 1720, by which Great Britain guaranteed the possession of Denmark Proper and part of Schleswig as a binding engagement; and in 1848 he appealed to it, as giving England a right to interfere to prevent the invasion of Denmark by Prussia. In that House too he had admitted the obligations of that treaty, and our ambassador at Vienna had been instructed to make representations upon it. And yet, on the 11th of April of the present year, the Foreign Secretary said in the other House that the Government had not made up their minds whether we were bound by it or not; and up to the present time it had never been stated distinctly that we were freed from those obligations. By this time, however, they were pretty well forgotten. If the new doctrine that treaties were put an end to by one Power engaged by them being at war was to prevail, we should hear no more of them, and the Treaty of Vienna would probably not trouble us much more. The same might be said of other treaties, such as that of 1856, by which we guarantee the provinces of European Turkey to the Porte. Certainly the noble Lord had not given his assent openly to the new doctrines, but it had been stated without shame by the principal newspapers of the country, that if our commercial interests were not involved, treaties were to be treated as waste paper. Such a principle tended to weaken the influence of this country; and nothing could be more lowering to our self-respect and national pride than to have to watch one of the weakest of our Allies dying by inches with her back to the wall and her face to the enemy, and then to walk off without paying the slightest regard to our treaty obligations. He thanked the hon. and learned Gentleman for having brought the subject forward, but he did not think that our responsibilities under the Treaty of 1815 need give him the slightest uneasiness.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am not going to follow my hon. and learned Friend in re-opening the subject of our recent discussions, and I can assure him that I am not going to stand up here as the champion of Prussia. My opinions as to the conduct of Prussia are pretty well known. But I cannot concur with him in thinking that because Prussia has made war on a country not belonging to the German Confederation, that on that account we are released from the engagements contained in the Treaty of Vienna, with regard to that portion of Saxony which was then allotted to Prussia. The two things have nothing whatever to do with each other. It was no part of the Treaty of Vienna, and no part of the guarantee which England—not alone, but with other Powers—gave, that Prussia should remain at peace for ever after that. The mere fact of Prussia having made war under such circumstances as those stated by my hon. Friend—objectionable as her conduct may be in every possible way—cannot release us from the treaty obligations which we contracted in 1815. It is quite true, as the hon. and learned Gentleman stated, that Austria and Prussia have started a principle of nationalities which, in its application, may become exceedingly inconvenient to themselves—more especially to Austria; but that is not the question at present. All I rise to say is, I still maintain that the transactions which have recently taken place, as between Austria and Prussia on the one hand, and Denmark on the other, in no way release us from the obligations which we contracted, in common with other Powers, in guaranteeing to Prussia that portion of Saxony which has been referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Question put, and agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 19 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 20,

MR. C. P. BERKELEY said, that the Vote referred to in this clause as "a sum of £18,355 for Civil Establishments on the Western Coast of Africa" included an item of £4,000 for the maintenance and repair of forts. Yet it appeared from official Reports that the forts at Cape Coast, Lagos, and other parts of the coast were in confusion and disorder, and in very bad repair. It was stated in a paper which he held in his hand, that if the Ashantees had marched on Lagos a few months ago they might have captured all the forts. As the £4,000 was not applied to the purpose for which it was voted, he begged to move the omission of the item.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the £4,000 was voted for "Forts and Establishments," and went in aid of the revenues of the colony, which amounted to only £7,000.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY thought that £4,000 out of the £18,000 was specifically applicable to the forts.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, speaking from an experience of several years in the Colonial Office, could assure the Committee that it never had been intended that the £4,000 should be applied to the repair of forts.

MR. COX observed, that in the Estimate on which the Vote had been moved, the £4,000 was stated to be for the "maintenance of Forts and Establishments."

MR. CARDWELL repeated that the Vote had not been taken for the repair of forts.

MR. DILLWYN thought it right that the opinion of the House should be tested as to whether these Votes were a farce or not.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE repeated that these Estimates were in the same form as they had been for several years past, and that this was in no sense a military Vote.

MR. COBDEN said, that this Vote was evidently intended to apply mainly to civil charges.

MR. WALPOLE said, he desired to speak on a point of Order. He had never witnessed the proposal of an Amendment to the Appropriation Bill, and he wished to know from the Chairman whether the Question could be put? When the House had granted £18,000 for a particular purpose, he wished to know whether it could be afterwards reduced to £14,000?

MR. COX said, that if the Resolution for the reduction of the Vote was carried, he apprehended that the hon. Gentleman would then move a clause appropriating the £14,000 according to the Vote.

THE CHAIRMAN said, this Bill was the last act of the House ratifying the Resolutions passed in Committee of Supply; and if it was the pleasure of the House, upon a revision of the Votes taken in Supply, to reduce any one of those Votes, he could not say that it would not be competent for the House to take that course.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, the Under Secretary for the Colonies had shown that the appropriation clause was drawn conformably with the Estimate, and the hon. Gentleman could not, by the forms of the House, appropriate the £4,000 to any other purpose than that for which it had been voted by the Committee of Supply.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH trusted that the House would not relax its hold upon its privileges.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, if there had been any doubt as to the appropriation of the sum in Committee of Supply the objection would have been valid.

MR. C. P. BERKELEY, after the discussion which had taken place, would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read 3^d To-morrow at Twelve of the clock.

NEW ZEALAND (GUARANTEE OF LOAN)

BILL—[BILL 150.]—THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Mr. WHALLEY thought, that if the Bill passed without further explanation, a very false and unfortunate impression would be produced in the colony. The statement of the Colonial Secretary as to the origin of the war in New Zealand had been perfectly satisfactory—namely, that it had originated not in the land question but owing to the massacre of British subjects; yet Member after Member had risen to declare that the war was discreditable to this country. Such declarations would be most distasteful to the colonists, and very discouraging to our soldiers and sailors who were serving in New Zealand. Now he begged to call upon the right hon. Gentleman to state whether he had not reasonable ground to believe that there were causes for this war which had never been openly dwelt upon, and whether the imputations on the colonists were wholly justifiable? He had seen it stated in a New Zealand paper, that wherever Sir George Grey went he traced the war to the machinations of the Roman Catholic priests. Instead of explicitly answering the question which had been addressed to him on this point, the Colonial Secretary met it by an evasion. A writer in a New Zealand newspaper stated that certain flags were captured from the rebels after an engagement, and every one of those flags had upon it a Roman Catholic cross. He looked upon it as a most remarkable circumstance, which ought to be inquired into. Two years ago the head of the Roman Catholics in New Zealand visited France, and took back with him twenty-five of the most advanced pupils of the Jesuit College. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he had any reason to believe that such impressions existed in the colony?

Mr. HENNESSY said, he could corroborate the statement of the hon. Member that some ecclesiastical influence was at the bottom of these proceedings; for he found that a Bishop in writing to the Governor of New Zealand stated that the most likely way to insure peace was to show a better disposition towards the Natives, whom he described as treating the settlers well. That, however, was a Protestant Bishop. And the Rev. Leonard Williams, in a despatch to the Governor, said that the settlers did not want to see the British troops coming there, and that several of the settlers had gone to Auckland, leaving their wives and children in lonely, unprotected situations, relying with confidence on the character of the Native inhabitants. The writer, moreover, said there was no evidence of their having joined in any hostile scheme until the dread of invasion drove them into a hostile alliance with other chiefs, and it was only the desperation of their condition which kept them in arms against the British Government. He wished to know whether the rumour was authentic, that despatches had been recently received from New Zealand conveying the information that a proclamation of a most sanguinary character had been issued by the authorities, not only directed to the confiscation of the land of the Natives, but also to deprive them of anything like a fair trial when taken in war. This contrasted strongly with the words of a message which they sent to one of our officers on the 2nd of March last before an engagement, and in which they stated that wounded and captured men and all women and children would be spared. Now it happened that in an engagement in which the Native loss amounted to seventy killed and some wounded, there was a large number of women among the sufferers. This was, no doubt, owing to some accident, but it was a most unfortunate circumstance. In many of these battles the number of Natives, even when they were successful, was less than the British troops, and the British Generals bore testimony to the valour of the Natives. The hon. Gentleman near him had the other night described the war as unjust and cruel; and Lord Grey last Session spoke of it as being caused by the just discontent of the Maories. Some of the European population sold powder and shot to be used against the British troops. The British tax-payer was paying for a war in which no British interest was involved, but which seriously compromised the honour of this country. He moved as an Amendment that the Bill be read a third time this day three months.

Sir HENRY WILLOUGHBY seconded the Motion. Before the battle of Taranaki it appeared that a large quantity of stores and arms were supplied to the Natives, and he wished to know whether the Secretary for the Colonies could give any information on that subject? It was monstrous that any portion of the colonists should be engaged in such a proceeding.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day month."—(Mr. Hennessy.)

MR. CARDWELL said, he was convinced that there was no truth in the imputation that the colonists furnished their enemies in the field with munitions of war. A large portion of the Native population were friendly to the British people; some were hesitating between the two sides, and in only a limited portion of the Island a hostile feeling existed. In that great Island the hostile population could not be prevented by any vigilance on the part of the Government or the commanding officers from obtaining a supply of munitions of war; but it was absurd to suppose that the British population, all of whom in the province of Auckland were in arms for the protection of their homes, were engaged in furnishing materials for their own destruction. If he did not with the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) attribute the origin of the rebellion to the Roman Catholic priests, neither did he, with the hon. Member for King's County (Mr. Hennessy), attribute it to the brethren of our blood who had settled in the colony. He would not take statements gathered from any accidental source, but he would take the words of the Governor of New Zealand. After describing the murderous outrage in which the war began, the Governor went on to say—

"Just after these murders, plots were formed by the same people and their adherents in the Lower Waikato for an attack upon the settlement of Auckland. The Natives who formed these plots were all well armed, and had long been preparing themselves for such enterprises. They had drilled their men, dressed them in uniforms, and appointed them to different ranks. What would have been said of the Government which, having the then recent and lamentable example at New Plymouth before its eyes, had hesitated to provide for the safety of the Queen's subjects."

It was in that conspiracy that the war originated, and it was to put it down that we were then engaged in war. Reference had been made to the representations made by various persons on behalf of the Natives; but the object was not to justify the rebellion, but to obtain mercy and consideration for the Natives. Mr. Sewell, for instance, said—

"The Manipotos, under their chief Rewi, a powerful and numerous tribe, are a lawless, turbulent set of men, living in a remote and difficult country, and ready to engage in any work of mischief."

Chief Justice Martin also said, we were stronger because we were avenging bloodshed, and that the conflict had not been desired or brought about by the Maori race, but by a turbulent minority belonging chiefly to one tribe. They brought no charge against the Maori race. They were dealing only with one set of rebels in one district of the colony. They were endeavouring to secure not only for the settlers but for the Maories the tranquil enjoyment of good order and prosperity. Such being the nature of the war, what had been Sir George Grey's policy? At that hour they would not desire him to quote despatches; and he would only say that Sir George Grey spoke of mercy being shown, wherever it was possible, after the war was concluded; and the instructions from the Home Government were based on the same principle. It was true mercy to bring this war to a speedy close; and when that had been accomplished, justice would be administered with mercy and consideration to the rebels, so as to restore tranquillity, and benefit both the British colonists and the great majority of the Maories. It was to further that view that the Bill had been introduced, and he hoped that at this stage the House would not withhold its approval. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Peterborough, he could only say he was not aware of any statement of Sir George Grey's of the nature of that attributed to him by the hon. Member. There were some statements, however, in the despatches to which he deemed it desirable not to give any currency, as there was quite ill-feeling enough in the colony without adding to it.

MR. WARNER hoped the House would take an early opportunity of expressing an opinion against the pernicious practice of guaranteeing colonial loans. It was the colonists who reaped the whole of whatever benefits accrued from such wars as this, while all the burden fell on the mother country.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, that there never was an occurrence to which the term accidental could more justly be applied than to the deaths of the women which had been referred to. Due notice of the British attack was given; but the Native chiefs miscalculated their strength, and their resistance to our soldiers led to some shells being discharged which killed the women. He hoped the House would pass the Bill. As to the sale of weapons, the letter of the Natives distinctly asserted it.

COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that he rose to make the explanation which he had promised when the House assented to the second reading. The Bill was the same as that of last year, with the exception of certain small changes in the schedule. The total estimated cost of the works remained unchanged, but it was arrived at in a somewhat different manner. For instance, in the "Sandown Bay defences," £10,000 more was put down this year, chiefly owing to engineering difficulties, arising from the nature of the ground at Fort Bembridge. There would also be an increased expenditure of £15,000 for the works at the Isle of Grain. There was a reduction in the estimates for the Hilsea Lines, in consequence of the manner in which it was now proposed that Portsdown Hill should be fortified. It was now proposed to abandon certain outworks, which would reduce the expenditure by about £20,000, and there would be a saving of £5,000 in the works at Picklecombe. It was not intended to enter into any new work which did not appear in the schedule, but he proposed to ask the House to vote £25,000 for works to the southward of Milford Haven, on the Pembroke station. The estimated cost of the works was £80,000, but no money had been actually asked for until the present year. At Spithead the contract was renewed last year, and the works had been recommenced. Great progress had been made with the Horse Sand Fort, and it was expected that the basement would be entirely completed and ready for the superstructure next summer. Upon No Man's Land the works were also advancing rapidly, although the basement would not be completed until the end of the year. The works at Spithead would be more expensive than was originally anticipated, as the special Commission appointed to consider the alterations requisite in the original plan for the defence of Spithead had recommended that works should be constructed on the Spitbank and on the Ryde Sand, about 1,200 yards to the southward of the Sturbridge Shoal. The works completed, or nearly so, were—on the Portsmouth station, the Needles, Warden Point, Puckpool, Eastney, and Lump's Batteries, Stokes Bay lines, Forts Grange, Rowner, and Brockhurst; on the Plymouth station, Drake's Island, Eastern King, Western King, Mount Edgumbe, Whitesand Bay, and Cawsand Bay batteries, Devonport lines, and Fort Tregantle; on the Pembroke station, South Hook, Hubberstone, and Popton batteries; on the Portland station, a small battery on the Inner Pierhead; and on the Dover station, Dover Castle and the Western Heights. Considerable progress had also been made on other works at Portsmouth, Plymouth, Pembroke, Portland, Gravesend, the Medway and Sheerness, Dover, and Cork. Of all the works specified in the schedule only seven were not yet under contract.

SIR JOHN HAY asked, whether it was intended to fortify Pembroke after the Report of the Select Committee recommending the sale of that dockyard?

SIR MORTON PETO thought that before the site of the central arsenal was decided upon, the House ought to have an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2,

MR. C. P. BERKELEY complained of the lumping together of the items for the different ports.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY inquired whether any calculation could be given of the number of men which would be required to hold all these fortifications. It was said that 40,000 men would be required for Portsmouth alone, and probably 250,000 for the whole of the proposed works.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the Resolution of the Committee recommending that Pembroke dockyard should be disposed of was carried by a majority of one only; and even assuming that hereafter that most magnificent dockyard was disposed of, which he trusted would not be the case for a long time, he sincerely hoped the House would not consent to leave one of the most magnificent harbours of the country undefended.

SIR MORTON PETO was surprised at the remarks of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty after the Report made by his own Committee. That Committee was at least entitled to have its recommendation respectfully considered, and he hoped the proposal as regarded Pembroke would not be pressed that night.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it was not intended this year to ask the House to vote any money for the site of the central arsenal, but it was fully intended to do so at a future time. There were at present as many works in hand as could be conveniently proceeded with at one time. With regard to Pembroke, he was quite unable to give any opinion as to the propriety of abandoning the dockyard there or not; but even if they did abandon it, it would be expedient to complete the works in progress there, for which the Vote asked this year was required.

SIR JOHN HAY thought that the explanation given by the noble Lord respecting Pembroke dockyard was most unsatisfactory. The noble Lord himself was Chairman of the Committee that decided against keeping up that dockyard, and the noble Lord himself suggested the reduction of its size. When the proper time arrived he (Sir John Hay) would certainly move the reduction of the Vote by £35,000, being the amount required for Pembroke dockyard.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, his report had referred only to the small dockyards, but he looked upon Pembroke as a most important one.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE suggested that the reference to the central arsenal should be omitted from the clause.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it was hardly necessary to strike out the words. The Act remained exactly the same as it had been. Hon. Members ought to accept the assurance of the Government on the subject. As to the estimated cost of the works at Spithead, he was informed that there was no doubt that the whole of the works could be executed for the original sum set down for the three works.

MR. ANGERSTEIN moved that the words which referred to the central arsenal should be omitted from the clause.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he would consent to the omission of the words from the second clause, but not from the schedule, because the principle had been recommended by the different Committees who had considered the question. The Government had no intention this year to propose to purchase any land, nor could such a purchase be made without the sanction of that House.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses.

Schedule—

SIR JOHN HAY proposed to omit Pembroke. He could not consent to the Vote of £35,000 for works at that dockyard.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, the fortification of Pembroke was as important as any works upon the southern coast.

Amendment negatived.

Original Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. WARNER moved the adjournment of the House.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Warner.)

Mr. KINNAIRD* said, that the other night the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) stated that the Church of Scotland did not object to the Bill, and quoted the authority of an eminent member of that Church, Dr. Lee. He (Mr. Kinnaird) would therefore, with the permission of the House, read some portions of a letter addressed by the rev. Doctor to himself. Dr. Lee wrote—

"I hold the same opinions (substantially) which you have so well expressed regarding the Scottish Episcopal Church Disabilities Bill. My friend Mr. Grant Duff, in alluding to my proceeding in this matter in the General Assembly, quite mistook my position and sentiments. My own opinion of this measure was never any secret. I have always regarded it as a violation of the Articles of Union, and as involving a virtual establishment of the Episcopal Church in Scotland, of which surely the Church of Scotland has reason and right to complain. This Bill reaches much further than its immediate and ostensible object, and it is not on account of its ostensible object that its concoctors and promoters chiefly value it. They know well that it will serve for ulterior ends of far greater importance. I believe, however, that the Church of Scotland would hardly have succeeded, however early or strenuous her opposition had been; and the attempt on her part to raise opposition now would probably result only in injury to ourselves. The Bill seems to be on the eve of passing the Commons. I cannot help expressing my wonder that no Scotch Member except yourself has taken the ground which you have taken. In fact, neither the Church of Scotland nor Presbyterianism is in any sense represented in Parliament. Most of the Scotch Members appear to know very little more about Scotland than the English Members, and with few exceptions they regard such questions as this through the medium either of Episcopal feelings or of some form of Dissent. There can be no doubt that a large body of the most intelligent of our ministers hold the sentiments you have expressed, and generally speaking the ablest of them hold these sentiments most strongly."

Another leading minister of the same Church, referring to other real disabilities, which he hoped Parliament would consider another year, says—

"The Church of Scotland would no more think of re-ordaining an Episcopal than a Presbyterian minister. Let the law of the Church of England be rendered such as to permit her Bishops to recognize Presbyterian 'orders,' and one objection to the Bill will be removed. If the Bill pass in its present shape, the members of the Established Church of England will be allowed to acknowledge as ministers those ordained by a particular section of Scottish Dissenters, but not those ordained by the Established Church of Scotland. A more monstrous piece of intolerance it is impossible to imagine perpetrated in this country. . . . Nothing can be more unjust than the exclusion of Her Majesty's Scottish chaplains from the royal chapels of England, and there being no provision for the maintenance of Presbyterian worship in the British Court and Legislature when they happen to be in England. Constitutionally the Church of Scotland is on terms of exact equality with the Church of England, and if men are to hunt out disabilities, let them find one in the Scotch Members of the Legislature being summoned to England, without their being provided with such means of worship as are enjoyed by their Colleagues of the Episcopal persuasion. . . . Mr. Duff's account of what passed in the General Assembly was not correct. I am sorry I have not now a spare copy of the newspaper reports of the discussion, but both Dr. Robert Lee and I, though not agreeing in many things, expressed our opinion as opposed to that of the majority of the Committee, which was that the Assembly should not petition against the Bill.

P.S.—I find I have omitted another very serious Presbyterian grievance, which ought to be redressed. Chapels are built with Government money for army stations, and yet chaplains of the Established Church of Scotland holding Her Majesty's Commission are refused admission into them, with the troops under their charge, because these chapels have been consecrated."

Standing almost alone as he had done, he had been unable to stop this most mischievous and cunningly devised Bill; but he would fain hope that its originators had unwittingly awakened a slumbering feeling, which would not be hushed again till real disabilities were removed, and the Protestant Church of England was rescued from the would-be grasp of men who see a sister, though a corrupt one, in the Church of Rome, but a great schism in the National Church of Scotland.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

Mr. WHALLEY moved that the Bill be read a third time this day month.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day month."—(Mr. Whalley.)

The House divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 10: Majority 24.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3^d, and passed, with an Amendment.

The Order of the Day for the Third Reading of the Bill having been read about three o'clock in the morning, the discussion which followed was not reported.

Sir W. HEATHCOTE, THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. GRANT DUFF, Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE supported the Bill. Mr. KINNAIRD, Mr. WARNER, Mr. NEWDEGATE, Mr. WHALLEY, spoke against the measure.

MASTERS AND SERVANTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. COBBETT, Bill to alter and amend the Law relating to contracts of service between Master and Servant, ordered to be brought in by Mr. COBBETT and Mr. Cox.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 232.]

LORD BROUGHAM presented Petitions from Birmingham and other places for the Employment of Certificated Teachers in Middle Class Schools. He had had the honour of introducing to his noble Friend the First Lord of the Treasury a deputation which urged upon him the prayer of the Petitioners, that the Government should apply its attention to the important subject of the education of the middle classes. There was no wish on the part of these persons to interfere with the middle class schools now existing. On the contrary, the Petitioners desired that those schools should be left entirely to themselves; but they were satisfied that if a system of supervision by Inspectors, who should have power to give certificates of character and ability, were established, there was scarcely one school in a hundred that would not voluntarily come under supervision for the very purpose of sharing in the great benefits which a certificate from the Inspectors would confer. The working classes in this country might be reckoned at 15,000,000; for the education of the children of those classes ample means were provided, and due inspection precluded objectionable and incompetent persons from teaching in their schools, and Parliament had voted not less than £5,000,000 for the education of the humbler classes. But for the education of the middle classes no provision whatever was made, no system of inspection was provided, nor any means taken to secure that the education given should be good. It was, however, estimated that the sums expended by the parents of the middle classes in schools for the education of their children amounted to not less than £4,000,000 yearly. The consequence of this entire want of supervision was that the quality of the education given at these schools was greatly complained of. The subject was one of great importance and deserved the gravest consideration on the part of the Government; and he (Lord Brougham) thought that a Commission to inquire into the subject might render great service.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he entirely concurred in the importance of the subject which his noble and learned Friend had brought under the notice of their Lordships. During the last few years great improvements had, no doubt, been made in the system of education in the schools supported by the State, and it was equally true that those improvements had been practically ignored by the middle class schools. But it was impossible that the education of the middle classes could be undertaken by the Government, both on account of the large amount of patronage which it would place in their hands, and the expenditure of public money upon those who could themselves afford to pay for the education of their children. A machinery of competitive examination had been devised by the Universities, which would be, he thought, of the greatest possible use in causing emulation among the larger middle class schools. He thought that a system of inspection for middle class schools might also be established, and that any school willing to place itself under inspection might claim an examination of its pupils by duly qualified Inspectors. There would be no objection on the part of such schools, he thought, to pay a small sum towards inspection, so as to make the system either wholly or in great part self-supporting.

REVIVAL OF THE HOLY ALLIANCE. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE rose to draw attention to the prevailing rumours concerning a supposed revival of the so-called Holy Alliance, and to inquire whether Her Majesty's Ministers have any information thereon which may be communicated to Parliament without prejudice to the public service; and said—My Lords, I rise to address your Lordships in pursuance of the notice which I placed on your Lordships' table some time ago. It was my intention to have brought forward the subject at an earlier period, but circumstances, independent of myself, have caused me to defer it until the present time. I need not tell your Lordships that the subject of my notice is of the greatest delicacy and importance. It may be said that the question which I ask your Lordships to consider is one merely arising from newspaper reports; but I think it may be shown that appearances are such that there is a reality which is well worthy of your Lordships' attention. 'It is now, my Lords, almost half a century since the Holy Alliance was first formed; but even now, at this distance of time, the impression that it made on the world is fresh in our recollection. It was thought a strange thing that three despotic Powers should have joined together in an alliance for purposes of personal understanding at a moment when so many of the States of Europe were engaged in settling the great questions which had been disturbed by the wars of revolutionary France. It was thought ominous that Powers of their immense extent and immense resources should have taken upon themselves to overlook the claims of other Powers, and that they should have embarked in a separate negotiation—and that, too, on principles which naturally created jealousy, distrust, and alarm throughout the greater part of Europe. The Treaties of Vienna and Paris that had been recently concluded had had for their object to compose existing differences, and to settle the affairs of Europe upon a permanent basis of justice and stability. Those great Powers were the principal agents in these negotiations; yet scarcely were the treaties put into action than it was found that those Powers were taking a separate position, and well-founded alarm was felt at the character of the engagements which they had contracted. It is very true that plausible explanations were given, and it is but fair to do justice to whatever may have been the good intentions of the Powers that founded that alliance. No doubt there were many people who thought that not much harm could result from that combination; but those who looked below the surface were well convinced that these engagements, whatever might be the intentions of the Powers who contracted them, were sure to degenerate into operations subversive of the liberty of Europe and dangerous to the independence of the weaker States. I must say, my Lords, while doing justice to those great Sovereigns who at that time rendered such eminent services to Europe, that they would have better consulted their own glory, and, perhaps, their own quiet, if they had been content to remain in concord with the other Powers without entering into any separate and more intimate coalition among themselves. The personal recollections of many of your Lordships go back to this period, and you may remember that the attention of Parliament was early called to this subject, and that, notwithstanding the votes of courtesy which accompanied its action, it substantially did its duty in the persons of many of its Members, who directed the public attention to the dangers and probable consequences of the so-called Holy Alliance, and raised their voices against it. I may appeal for confirmation to a noble and learned Friend of mine who took a prominent part in all the condem-

nations of that hour, and whom it is a great satisfaction to me still to see in your Lordships' House. I may call upon him to carry back his recollection to those times, and I shall be gratified to hear upon this occasion the well-known tones of his voice, which has been so often raised in the service of humanity, and which is always listened to both here and elsewhere with attention and respect. Courtesy prevented the Government of that day from expressing its opinion upon the course pursued by friendly Governments, but it declined to join the Alliance, and, seconded by the general feeling of the country, did what depended upon it to throw discredit upon it. The Alliance fell gradually into a state of abeyance; but that circumstance did not prevent it from showing, as occasions offered in subsequent years, what was its true character. Above all, upon the occasion which was referred to by my noble Friend opposite (Earl Russell) the other night, your Lordships will remember that in 1823, when Spain was struggling for its liberties, a French army—the army of the Restoration—commanded by the Duc d'Angoulême, and hounded on, I may say, by these potentates, disregarded the protests of this country (protests which proceeded from every party in the country) and succeeded in overpowering the efforts of the Spanish people for freedom, and placed King Ferdinand on an irresponsible throne. These things cannot be forgotten; and, therefore, when we witness circumstances which lead us to apprehend that there is danger of the revival of such an Alliance, we naturally take an interest in the matter, which, I believe, will not be confined to a few individuals in this House, but when the subject is understood, will, no doubt, be shared by the public at large. It may be said that this apprehension of a revival of the Alliance rests in the first instance on rumours which may have been of an evanescent kind, which passed from mouth to mouth, but may have had no solid foundation in fact. But circumstances have followed, which give importance to these rumours, which, I think, may fairly be brought forward, and which, in their combination, will show that there is, at least a plausible, though possibly not a clear and solid foundation for the apprehension of the revival of that Alliance. The newspapers have published statements echoing the public apprehension on this subject. I may be told that newspaper reports are little better than public rumours; but that I can hardly admit at a time when the public journals are conducted with so much skill and attention to facts, and when persons are employed by them abroad, who would do credit to the service of any Government—gentlemen of education, gentlemen who are not only capable of reporting what passes before their eyes, but of obtaining the greatest distinction by the exercise of their powers. The statements to which I refer must be fresh in the recollection of your Lordships, and although I have them at hand, so recent are their dates that it is perhaps hardly necessary that I should refer to them in a more particular manner. We all remember the circumstances which attended the mission of Baron Manteuffel from St. Petersburg to Vienna, and what remarkable occurrences followed upon that event. Scarcely was it known that he had succeeded in the object of his mission when it was perceived that the war in Denmark was taking a more aggressive character, the troops of Russia on a large scale were put in motion, and Austria, notwithstanding the line which she took last year, placed Galicia and Cracow in a state of siege. When all these circumstances are put together and joined with others which were known at the time, hardly a doubt can remain that the communications which passed between the three Sovereigns at that period were of a nature which went far beyond the ostensible object of the mission. The conclusions which we must draw are of a nature to arouse apprehensions, and to justify the adoption of a serious view of this most important subject. There are also other circumstances which come in aid of these. I would allude particularly, with all due reserve, to that correspondence which has occasioned some communications in this House, and the authority of which has been on the part of one or two of the Powers concerned seriously denied. There are, however, parts of that correspondence, which is well known to your Lordships, to which, as far as I am aware, no formal refutation has been given. There are circumstances which give a great probability of authenticity to that correspondence, to which I will call the attention of my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary and the House. It is stated in a despatch, alleged to be from Prince Gortschakoff, that a certain line was taken, or was to be taken, with regard to operations in

Denmark; and the same thing is referred to in another despatch of a private character, in which it is mentioned that Her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg was apprised by Prince Gortschakoff of that communication to the Prussian Government. Now, it would be the duty of Her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg to communicate what passed on that occasion to his Government; and I would ask the noble Earl opposite whether, in his official correspondence with the Ambassador, there is any trace of such a communication having been made. There is also a reference in another despatch to a conversation between the Austrian Ambassador and the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. If that is true it may be a question whether, although the whole correspondence may not be accurately given, it may not be in substance correct, and well worthy of attention. There are other circumstances which confirm the belief, that although the whole of the published despatches may not be authentic, in substance the correspondence may be correct. The well-known policy of the three Sovereigns, the interests they have at stake, the spirit which pervades their conduct, all give an a priori notion of its credibility and a strong presumption of its substantial truth. Now, my Lords, if it should happen that that which rested on rumour in the first instance and on the occurrence of particular circumstances in the second place—not to mention the meeting of the Sovereigns, who might have done all that they thought fit by means of secret negotiation being accompanied by their confidential advisers—should turn out to be substantially correct, it is not, I think, going too far to say that we find ourselves in the presence of a great danger. What, I would ask, are those Powers to whom the intentions to which I have referred are ascribed? Your Lordships are aware of their resources, of the extent of their population, of the military force which they possess, and of the position which they occupy in Europe. They are strong in all those elements which give strength, particularly strength of an aggressive character. Suppose, then, danger to exist in the manner which I have represented, I can hardly suppose it to be greater than as it exists arising out of such a combination; nor is this danger confined to the power which may be wielded by those great Sovereigns. Neither is it confined to the community of interest by which they may be actuated. It extends to other points which cannot be overlooked. There is a provocative to popular reaction on the Continent of a very dangerous character. I would ask your Lordships whether the state of Europe and of the world at the present time is such that we can view the principles maintained by those great Sovereigns without a feeling of great apprehension for European society? If all the instruments of armed power were brought into play for the purpose of keeping down those who would naturally wish to vindicate their claim to better treatment, can that, I would ask, be done without stirring up a strong feeling of reaction throughout the world? This is a state of things which it has been the main object of our statesmen to avoid; yet we now see, day after day, despotism advancing on the one side and democracy on the other; despotism armed to carry its views into effect in the most oppressive manner, and democracy fostering a spirit which may rise into aggression. This Alliance may have the effect of bringing both these forces into action—for the extension of the aggressive power on the part of the Sovereigns would inevitably stir up a strong spirit of resistance over Europe. This very morning, when bearing in mind that I would have to address your Lordships this evening, I saw a manifesto of the revolutionary party in Italy calling on their fellow-subjects to prepare for some attempt, the nature of which was only indicated by the name of Mazzini. Surely I do not err when I say that we should be likely to find no place for our interests in either extreme. We in this country fortunately enjoy a constitutional form of government, to which we are attached. We have a throne, a free Legislature, and the means of preserving those privileges which we hold so dear. If the principles which are well known to belong to the Governments of which I have spoken should come into operation, or if, on the other hand, the popular reaction to which I have referred should take place, where shall we find an intermediate course to check the dangers on both sides? I know of no other except that which is to be found in war or in preparatory negotiation. So far as negotiation is concerned, I am not aware that we have anything to replace those earlier alliances of the last century, which gave us support on many pressing occasions; and it becomes a question whether the public obligations of our position are sufficient to demand that we should risk the hazard of war. I trust that if I need any justification in the eyes of your Lordships the apprehension of an alliance which would bring together certain Powers in a spirit dangerous to the world will justify me in laying the question before you, and in extending the scope of my observations to subjects which are connected with it, although they may not appear to have any direct bearing upon it. Considering the dangers to which I have alluded, it would be most satisfactory if we could see some system of foreign policy adopted in a direction favourable to the recovery of that position towards the other Powers which appears of late to have been considerably weakened—a position in which we might count on the support of other Powers, and above all on the support of that powerful neighbour so near to us in position, and brought so close to us by the sympathies of a generous competition. It would be a great satisfaction to know that Her Majesty's Government are not neglectful of the duty of keeping up a friendly understanding with the illustrious Sovereign of that country—a man who has deserved well of us on many occasions, and who has earned his position in Europe by the exercise of remarkable abilities—abilities so great as to throw into the shade those matters which in former times were justly considered to deserve censure. I should be glad if the principle of a friendly understanding with that great Power were reverted to, and also if the tendency of our foreign policy were such as to rely not merely on the effects of our wide-spread commerce to bring us nearer to those from whom we have lately been estranged. We are told that the interests of commerce may be relied on to bring together all countries, and to relieve us from all anxiety for the preservation of peace. My Lords, I cannot place my entire reliance on that doctrine. I say, on the contrary, that in proportion as our commerce increases we are exposed to greater risks of collision. We have ships in every port, and interests in every sea, and on one point or another we are constantly coming into contact with other Powers. Scarcely a month passes without something happening which may bring us into the danger of a difference with some other country. The state of our relations with more than one Foreign Power at the present moment justifies me in saying that. Therefore, although our extensive commerce is the source of great national prosperity, yet I recognize also in it a constant source of danger from collision with the interests of other countries. We always find ourselves under the necessity of being prepared to defend our fellow-subjects, and to defend our interests against the jealousies on the one side, and encroachments on the other, which may always be expected from the strife of human passions, and which we cannot hope to escape. We may wrap ourselves up in the intention of being just towards others, and of giving up what there was of encroachment in our ancient system; but we have to consider the disposition of other nations, and we have to consider what we are exposed to by our constantly coming into contact with nations of every kind, and interests of every description. I can see no means of making head against contingencies of this kind, except by maintaining our military defences, and by keeping our alliances in such a position that we may have something to rely upon on the day of trial. We are told that interference in foreign affairs is sure to bring us into the danger of collision with other countries. My Lords, this is altogether a matter of judgment. There are cases when a timely and wise interference is the best security against war, and the best preservative of the peace of Europe. It is entirely a matter of discretion and judgment with respect to the time and the manner of applying the principle of interference. We can no more dogmatize or indulge in general abstract professions of opinion on the principle of interference than on the question of peace or war. Of late we have heard opinions expressed which would make it appear that we are drifting into an attitude where the interests of our commerce are to supersede all other considerations. I have learned in my life that those who profess themselves most pacific are often most exposed to attack. If we wish to be safe and to escape that which has been the almost proverbial fate of all commercial countries, we must preserve that high spirit of nationality and that nobility of heart which tells us that our best interests are not based on mere sordid calculations of profit and loss. I am afraid that I have trespassed too long upon your Lordships' attention, and though I am conscious that I have not done it full justice, yet the importance of the question is such that it may be left with perfect safety to your Lordships' reflection. The noble Viscount concluded by asking, Whether Her Majesty's Ministers have any information with regard to the prevailing rumours concerning a supposed revival of the so-called Holy Alliance which may be communicated to Parliament without prejudice to the public service?

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, the remarks made on this subject by my noble Friend are of very grave importance, coming as they do from one of his talents and high authority. My noble Friend cannot but be sensible that in calling the attention of your Lordships to this subject, and addressing you at considerable length with regard to the apprehensions which he appears to entertain, he must give force to similar apprehensions in the minds of others, and help to spread the alarm which he himself feels. Therefore, my noble Friend must excuse me, and I hope your Lordships will excuse me, if I enter somewhat fully into the subject on which he has spoken. This question of my noble Friend is, in fact, three questions. The first is as to the genuineness of the documents which have lately appeared in the public papers; the next is as to whether there is anything like a revival of the Holy Alliance; and the third is as to the amount of apprehension which we ought to feel, supposing the existence of such an Alliance to be a matter of fact. Now, my Lords, with regard to the first of these questions, I cannot say that I myself have any belief in the genuineness of the documents which have been published. My noble Friend has alluded particularly to two of those documents. There certainly is a despatch addressed by Prince Gortschakoff to the diplomatic representative of Russia at Berlin. That despatch was read by Prince Gortschakoff to Lord Napier; and the substance of it was afterwards communicated to me by the Russian Minister at the Court of St. James's. In looking over the accounts which Lord Napier gave me of that document, and comparing it with what has appeared in The Morning Post, I see but a very distant resemblance between the two; and my memory of what was read to me by the Russian Minister leads me to the same conclusion. It appears to me that any one conversant with the politics of Europe—either through the Courts, or by commerce—might have obtained such an idea of what was going on as would have enabled him, without seeing the original, to fabricate a despatch as closely resembling the genuine one. Another of the published despatches seems to have been fabricated for the purpose of making the English Government believe that the course of the Russian Government was one of fraud and duplicity. It appears that that despatch is altogether false. It is stated to be so, and I entirely believe the statement. The other document is one giving an account of a conversation between the Count Ap-ponyi and Mr. Layard, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Such a conversation did take place, and there is some resemblance, though not a close one, between the real conversation and the reported one, as far as the topics are concerned, but it is in some respects singularly erroneous—particularly in regard to dates. There are various circumstances which give an air of improbability to the genuineness of those documents. One of these circumstances is that the Foreign Minister of Prussia is supposed in this correspondence to have written to one of the representatives of that country, and in his despatch to have referred to a difference of feeling as between the King and himself. Now, that is highly improbable. There is another part of the correspondence which represents Austria, Prussia, and Russia as having come to an agreement that they would consider all questions relating to Poland as referring to internal policy, and therefore to a subject on which they ought not to be called on to render an account to any other Power. Now, such a proceeding on the part of the Sovereigns of those three countries would have been an unnecessary one; for if they had arrived at the conclusion that they would not fulfil their treaty obligations, they might have violated them without making that formal declaration. The next question is, supposing those documents not to be genuine, are there circumstances which give a certain support to the belief of some action of the kind having taken place, and a union having been formed between the three Powers? Well, there have been transactions within the past month which it is not very difficult to account for, and which do give a certain semblance of truth to the substance of those documents. For instance, it is well known that in Austria, Russia, and Prussia there is very extreme apprehension that those Powers are constantly expressing their desire that all the European Sovereigns should unite in order to resist revolutionary movements. But I believe that for the language represented by those documents to have been used on that subject, there is not more than that general foundation which might easily be obtained by commercial men who, for their own interest, are anxious to obtain the most recent accounts of what is doing in Europe, and may affect prices in the various markets. I am told that those documents were derived from commercial men. I now come to another question, which appears to be the gravest of those upon which my noble Friend touched—namely, what is this Holy Alliance, and what are the apprehensions which we should entertain if it were established? Looking back—but putting aside the “Holy Brotherhood” of 1815, which was rather a form of expression used by the Emperor Alexander of Russia, when expressing his anxiety for united action between Sovereigns—putting that aside as of no practical account, we know that in 1820 there was an agreement which has been popularly described as “the Holy Alliance.” About December, 1820, an agreement was entered into between Austria, Russia, and Prussia. I shall read an extract from a circular issued to the Austrian, Prussian, and Russian Ministers at Foreign Courts, and dated Laybach, May 21, 1821, in order to show what the purpose of that Alliance was, and in order that we may be able to form an opinion as to whether it is likely such an agreement should be come to at the present time. The circular states—

“Useful or necessary changes in legislation, and in the administration of States, ought only to emanate from the free will and the intelligent and well-weighed conviction of those whom God has rendered responsible for power. All that deviates from this line necessarily leads to disorder, commotions, and evils far more insufferable than those which they pretend to remedy. Penetrated with this eternal truth, the sovereigns have not hesitated to proclaim it with frankness and vigour; they have declared that, in respecting the rights and independence of all legitimate power, they regarded as legally null, and as disavowed by the principles which constitute the public right of Europe, all pretended reform operated by revolt and open hostility. They have acted conformably to this declaration, in the events which have taken place at Naples, in those of Piedmont, and in those even which, under very different circumstances, though produced by combinations equally criminal, have recently made the eastern part of Europe a prey to incalculable convulsions.”

My Lords, when that circular was issued it became a very serious question for the Government of this country what part they should take with respect to a combination so formidable, and founded on such principles. The consequences of such a policy could not escape a man of the sagacity of Lord Castlereagh, and on the 19th of June, 1821, he wrote a circular on the subject. That circular was as follows:—

“These measures embrace two distinct objects—first, the establishment of certain general principles for the regulation of the future political conduct of the Allies in the cases therein described.

The system of measures proposed under the former head, if to be reciprocally acted upon, would be in direct repugnance to the fundamental laws of this country. But, even if this decisive objection did not exist, the British Government would nevertheless regard the principles on which these measures rest to be such as could not safely be admitted as a system of international law. They do not regard the Alliance as entitled, under existing treaties, to assume in their character as Allies any such general powers, nor do they conceive that such extraordinary powers could be assumed, in virtue of any fresh diplomatic transaction among the Allied Courts, without their either attributing to themselves a supremacy incompatible with the rights of other States, or, if to be acquired through the special accession of such States, without introducing a federative system in Europe, not only unwieldy and ineffectual to its object, but leading to many most serious inconveniences.”

When Parliament met, this circular was laid before it, and it excited, as might be expected, great discussion. Lord Lansdowne brought the subject before this House, the noble Lord whom I see opposite (the Earl of Ellenborough) protested against the conduct of the Allies, and Lord Liverpool spoke strongly to the same effect. There was also a debate in the House of Commons, at the instance of Sir James Mackintosh, in which similar sentiments were expressed. But in spite of the protests of the representatives of England the plans of the Holy Alliance were carried into effect. A large Austrian army was marched to Naples, the existing Government was overthrown, and 40,000 Austrian troops put an end to all hopes of the revival of any popular spirit. The English Government, therefore, had no influence in regard to the practical measures adopted by the Allies. In 1823 another Congress met at Verona, and it was then considered that the revolution which had taken place in Spain and the constitution there established called for interference, and should be the subject of another armed intervention by the Holy Alliance. Upon that occasion my noble and learned Friend whom I see opposite (Lord Brougham) delivered a speech of such eloquence that there is not a greater to be found in the records of ancient or modern times. The feelings which my noble and learned Friend expressed were those which prevailed throughout the country. Lord Castlereagh said that this system was repugnant to the fundamental principles of British law; and Mr. Canning, who was Foreign Minister at that period, said that the system struck at the root of the British Constitution. There could be no doubt whatever, therefore, of the feelings which prevailed in this country on the part both of the Government and the Opposition. But there, again, the influence of England failed in producing any practical effect. An army of France was marched to Madrid, and afterwards to Cadiz, the Revolutionary Government was overthrown, and Ferdinand VII. was restored to absolute power. It might have been asked then, what was the use of those despatches of Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Canning? They might as well not have been written, for any practical effect which they produced. But, my Lords, my belief is that the assertion of sound principles—of the principles of freedom and justice—by a British Minister on the part of his Government, and their assertion also in the Parliament of this country, are by no means without effect. Although at any particular moment it may not be advisable to enforce those principles and sentiments by arms, yet, if they are just and sound, they will have their effect, and will finally pervade the general policy of Europe. Having adverted to what occurred on those occasions, let us now see what happened not a great many years after. In 1823 a French army was marched into Spain, where it remained for some time, and overthrew the Revolutionary Government. But in 1830 France herself was disturbed by revolution, the reigning dynasty was overthrown, and a Government founded on revolt was established. What then did the Holy Allies? Did they say that a Government founded on revolt was null and void? Did they attempt to suppress it as they had suppressed the Governments of Naples and Spain? No, they found the effort would be too great—that the power of the revolution was too strong for them to cope with. They did not acknowledge the new dynasty, which the Duke of Wellington, to his honour, acknowledged almost the next day after its creation. But, though they did not acknowledge, they did not attempt to overthrow it. And with respect to the changes which took place

eighteen years afterwards, when a Republic was proclaimed in France, and a few years after that Republic was changed into an Empire, those Allies, who had declared that nothing was legal but what emanated from Sovereigns, that every other political change was null and void, and force must be used to suppress it, those Allies were powerless when the greatest country in Europe was in the throes of revolution, and when the people said they would have a Government according to their own views, and not according to the views of Austria, Prussia, and Russia. Well then, my Lords, I do conceive that, although the Government of England did not go to war, it by no means followed that those principles of the Holy Alliance were everywhere established, or that they had that success which their authors expected. On the contrary, from 1830 an alliance was formed between England, France, Spain, and Portugal in support of the dynasty established and favoured by the people. After 1848 other changes took place. Your Lordships will recollect that only a few years ago, when the French army had entered Italy, the Emperor of Austria gave up Lombardy, which was ceded to the King of Sardinia, who is now King of Italy, and that the Power which had attempted to interfere in Naples, in Tuscany, and in the Pope's territories, was obliged to retire into Venetia. Then, at all events, was given a great blow to the principles of the Holy Alliance. But it did not stop there, because, after the Treaty of Villafranca and the Treaty of Zurich, a question arose whether or not Tuscany and Naples should have a Government according to their own wishes—whether the existing dynasties should be maintained or destroyed? That question arose at the time when I first had the honour of holding the seals of the Foreign Office, and I had occasion to discuss with the Austrian Government the preliminaries of the Peace of Villafranca. Those preliminaries stated in general terms that the Grand Duke of Tuscany and the Duke of Modena should return to their States. Two different senses might be attributed to this article—either that any resistance on the part of the population of those States might be overcome by force, or that the Sovereigns should return only with the consent of the people. In writing to Mr. Fane, August 16, 1859, I said—

ence in the internal affairs of other countries, Her Majesty's Government hold that non-intervention is the principle on which the Governments of Europe should act, only to be departed from when the safety of a foreign State, or its paramount interests, require it. But in the present instance they maintain that neither the interests of Italy, nor the interests of Europe, nor the real interests of Austria or France, require foreign interference in the internal affairs of Italy. The Treaty of Villafranca, as I have said, makes no provision for imposing a Government by force upon Tuscany or Modena, supposing the people of those Duchies to oppose the return of the Grand Duke of Tuscany and the Duke of Modena. A provision for the employment of French or Austrian forces, to put down the clearly-expressed will of the people in Central Italy would, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, not be justifiable. The people of Tuscany, for instance, have the right, which belongs to the people of every independent State, to regulate their own internal government. To interfere by force with the exercise of that right would not be defensible on any principle of public law. Neither the safety nor the paramount interests of Austria are menaced by the choice of a new dynasty to reign over Tuscany. On the contrary, the restoration of the Grand Duke of Tuscany or the Duke of Modena by foreign forces would be to return to that system of foreign interference which for upwards of forty years has been the misfortune of Italy and the danger of Europe. It may be added that for the last ten years the same system has been a cause of weakness and peril to Austria. It has afforded vantage-ground to her enemies, and has alienated her friends. Great Britain would, therefore, feel it to be her duty to protest against a supplement to the Treaty of Villafranca of that nature, if any such were in contemplation. She would equally protest against the practical application of foreign force to carry into effect the vague article of the preliminaries of Villafranca."

Well, then, in the former instance we have seen that in 1821, notwithstanding the protest of Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Canning, an Austrian army marched to Naples, Turin, and Tuscany; but in this instance the French Government, which before had connived at the act of the Austrian Government, not only held aloof, but it was generally understood that the French Emperor would oppose any attempt to restore the Dukes to their territories by force. In like manner, when a small force of a thousand men made a revolution in the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, the plan of the Holy Alliance entirely failed, and the Austrian Government did not venture to interfere. Your Lordships will, therefore, see that there is no great reason for the apprehension that my noble Friend (Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe) has expressed, since the Holy Alliance of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, which was able to carry out its objects in 1821 and 1823, was not able to carry out its objects in 1859 and 1860 against the simple protest of this country. So far as Italy is concerned, an united Italy has been established by the people of that country, and the Holy Alliance has entirely failed to prevent it. Well, in regard to Spain, it has been much the same. In 1823 Spain was overrun by French forces, but the people of Spain now have the full power of making their constitution just as they please, and of regulating their internal affairs according to their own views. Therefore, it has happened by the great change of circumstances and events, that the influence which the Government of this country did not possess in 1821 and 1823 for the last five years they have fully possessed, and the people of different countries have established Governments according to their own notions of what is necessary for their own interests. The extract I have read referred to the affairs of Greece. One of the Allies—the Emperor of Russia—protested formerly in the most peremptory manner against the revolution established by the people against the Sovereign; but a year or two ago, when the revolt took place in Greece, the Sovereign reigning there by the choice of the protecting Powers was overthrown, a new Sovereign was called to the throne, and the Emperor of Russia and the Holy Alliance consented to acknowledge—and not only to acknowledge, but to guarantee—the throne of the new Sovereign. I hold, therefore, for all these reasons, that whatever the Holy Alliance may have been, its revival at this time need not give cause for apprehension. I cannot believe that those sovereigns, seeing the change of times, have any wish to do more than protect their own dominions and secure themselves against democratic innovations that may seek to overturn them. My noble Friend who began the debate spoke of despotism, and, unfortunately, all those Sovereigns who rule over despotic countries confound constitutional government with democracy. The party of reaction in Italy confound constitutional monarchy with despotic sway. But the influence of the English Government has always been used in favour of constitutional monarchy whenever the people of a country thought that the best form of Government for themselves. And now, my Lords, where is the danger that we have to fear from these alliances at the present moment? If we look to the South of Europe—to Italy and Spain—we find that the Powers which formed the Holy Alliance have given up every attempt to carry into effect those principles against which Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Canning protested, and there is, therefore, no danger either in Italy or Spain of the principles of the Holy Alliance being restored. Where, then, is the danger? The only country in which any question of the kind can now arise is in regard to the Duchies of Denmark. It is now said that an attempt will be made—and possibly it may be so—to dispose of the sovereignty of those Duchies according to the views of the Diet of Frankfort, should the King of Denmark consent to give up those Duchies to Austria and Prussia. I confess that that appears to me to be a question for Germany rather than for us to consider. If the King of Denmark should give up the sovereignty of those Duchies—and it is now said on good authority that the Duchies of Lauenburg, Schleswig, and Holstein are demanded by Austria and Prussia as the price of peace—supposing those Duchies are given up to the control of Austria and Prussia, it is for those Powers to settle with the people of Germany, and for the people of Holstein and Schleswig to say whom they will consent to obey. With respect to the part taken by ourselves in the late Conference, we showed what our principles were. We and the Government of France both said that these Duchies, if they were given up by Denmark, ought not to be disposed of without the consent of the people of the Duchies. The King of Denmark said exactly the same thing. The Swedish representatives were of the same opinion. At all events, we declared the views which we held. Our principle is a principle in which we concurred with the Emperor of the French, and on which we did not concur with Austria or Prussia. Now, my Lords, the consequence of this great difference of opinion with the latter Powers is, that we should draw nearer to France and be less connected with those Powers which declare that the sovereignty ought to be separate from the wish of the people. My noble Friend who has just spoken said it was our interest to be closely connected with France. It so happens that a question lately arose of great importance and delicacy—namely, what was to be done with regard to the Danubian Principalities? Her Majesty's Ambassador and the French Ambassador at Constantinople entirely concurred in the settlement of this question. The Grand Vizier and other Ministers of the Porte agreed upon a plan which was approved by the Conference, and thus a question that at one time threatened to disturb the tranquillity of Turkey, if not the peace of Europe, was amicably settled by wise and judicious negotiations. I cannot help remarking how much Her Majesty's Government, in co-operation with the French Ambassador, have been able to do in obtaining a settlement of that question; and the answer to my despatch read to me to-day from M. Drouyn de Lhuys expresses the hope that the accord which has existed between France and Great Britain on this important subject will be the harbinger of our agreement on other important subjects which may come before them. Her Majesty's Government heartily hope that this may be so, for there can be nothing more conducive to the peace of Europe than a cordial agreement between England and France. While that agreement exists there is not the least apprehension of the revival of a Holy Alliance, even if the Sovereigns who formerly belonged to it should be so ill-advised and so little aware of the state of feeling in Europe as to enter into so inauspicious a combination.

BISHOPRIC OF CORNWALL.

ADDRESS FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

EARL NELSON rose to move for a copy of the Correspondence between the Archbishop of Canterbury and Sir George Grey in reference to the formation of a Bishopric of Cornwall. The noble Earl called attention to the necessity which existed for an increase of the Episcopate, and expressed a hope that during the recess the subject would engage the attention of Her Majesty's Government, and that before next year something would be done to add to the efficiency of the Church of England in this respect.

Moved,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copy of Correspondence between the Archbishop of Canterbury and Sir George Grey in reference to the Formation of a Bishopric of Cornwall."—(Earl Nelson.)

THE BISHOP OF LONDON inquired whether the noble Earl's Motion included the correspondence which had taken place with reference to the appointment of a suffragan to relieve the Bishop of Exeter of some of his duties?

EARL NELSON said, that his Motion did not include that correspondence, but he should be quite willing to add words which would do so.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that as this correspondence had been presented to the other House, there would of course be no objection to lay it upon their Lordships' table.

Motion agreed to.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE moved the omission of the proviso exempting Ireland from the provisions of the Bill.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE urged upon the noble Earl not to press his Amendment. He had received letters from the West of Ireland expressing alarm that if the Bill were extended to that country there would not be a lamb left.

Amendment negatived.

Amendments made: Bill to be read 3^a To-morrow, and to be printed as amended. (No. 243).

[BILL 213.] CONSIDERATION.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [21st July], "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration."

Question again proposed,

Debate resumed.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered.

MR. HENNESSY moved a new clause enacting that any person, being a natural born subject of Her Majesty, who may be desirous of being appointed an assistant-surgeon in the said forces, shall be admitted to be examined as a candidate for such appointment. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India and himself differed very little as to their opinions upon the subject; and his Motion, if carried, would only put into the Act what the right hon. Gentleman had declared to be the intention of the Government. His Motion was taken verbatim from the existing law, and would prevent the exercise of arbitrary power which would be warranted by the Bill in its present form. Although, therefore, his clause might not be exactly in conformity with the Bill, it ought to be inserted and become a portion of the measure. The present Bill was only a device to cover the misconduct of the Government in reference to their treatment of these officers, for in respect to rank, pay, and general position they had been so badly treated that there was a difficulty in procuring officers in that department of the service. He would quote the opinion of that day's Lancet, a high authority in such matters—

"Sir Charles Wood alleged on Tuesday night last in the House of Commons that competitive examinations for the army medical service had entirely failed, and has introduced an India Medical Service Bill which would do away with competitive examinations. We do not hesitate to declare that Sir Charles Wood has been completely misinformed on this subject, and has entirely misled the House. The examinations have been highly successful, and Sir Charles Wood could not have consulted either the civil profession or the army medical service, much less the examiners themselves, before he made the statement of their complete failure. They have only been a little too successful for the Government. They have interposed a check on the proceedings of the Horse Guards by affording an index of the depression in the quality and the number of the candidates which the uniform harshness, morgue, and injustice of that department have caused. They propose, then, to do away with competitive examinations; to destroy the index and silence the tell-tale. It is no doubt an ingenious device to cover the injury which they have done and are doing to the army; but it can only serve to increase the defect in the quality of the candidates, and to damage the efficiency of the service by admitting indiscriminately those whom the competitive examinations would have rejected, and such as were utterly inefficient. If the House of Commons would take the trouble to investigate the question at all, we feel assured that it would never consent to abolish competitive examinations for the Army Medical Department. Mr. Longfield and Mr. Hennessy have rendered a public service in offering a spirited opposition to the progress of the India Medical Service Bill in its present form; and we hope that Mr. Hennessy will further master the details of the question, which will show how greatly such an abolition would be opposed to the best interests of the army."

As regarded the system of competitive examination, Sir John Lawrence in 1860 or 1861 said that its results had been within his own experience eminently successful. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman distinctly, whether he was of opinion that the competitive examinations ought to be kept up? He wished to have an explicit answer, because they must not put their faith in Princes, much less in Secretaries of State.

COLONEL SYKES seconded the Motion. He could not understand the objection which his right hon. Friend entertained towards the clause, because it was almost word for word a portion of the Queen's Proclamation to the people of India. He was glad to find that his right hon. Friend had removed many of the grievances under which the old service had laboured. He thought that the new officers should be grafted upon the old service. He had heard that day that a Native had been appointed to the office of Judge of the High Court of Bombay. That appointment did the right hon. Gentleman great credit, and such a course would do more to conciliate the people of India than the presence of 80,000 bayonets, and for each such appointment the Government might rest assured that they might remove a regiment.

Clause (Any person, being a natural born subject of Her Majesty, who may be desirous of being appointed an assistant surgeon in the said forces, shall be admitted to be examined as a candidate for such appointment.)—(Mr. Hennessy),—brought up, and read 1^o.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he could not allow the hon. and learned Gentleman to imagine that he was averse to the principle of competitive examination, because he was the first to introduce the principle into this branch of the service, by an Act which he passed in 1853. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not seem to understand what the object of the Bill was. Previous to 1853 assistant-surgeons were appointed by the East India Company, and there was never at that time any deficiency in the supply of able candidates. In 1853 the service was thrown open to competition. The system had not answered as regarded India. In eighteen months—from July, 1859, to December, 1860—there were 90 vacancies and only 72 candidates, of whom only 52 succeeded in passing; so that the supply for eighteen months had fallen short of the demand by 40. Now, what he proposed by the Bill was to enable the assistant-surgeons of the Queen's army, all of whom obtained their appointments by competition, to volunteer, if they so pleased, into the Indian service. The quotation which the hon. and learned Gentlemen had read from The Lancet referred, not to the Indian service, but to the Queen's service, with regard to which open competition had answered exceedingly well. With that service he did not propose to interfere—he only wished to be enabled to form a staff medical corps out of assistant-surgeons who had entered the Queen's service by open competition. As regarded Natives, he was not prepared to state what course he should adopt, but on that point he would consult the Government in India. Some remedy was absolutely called for; but the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman did nothing but restore a system which had already been found a failure. The matter was one of great importance, because he had just received a communication from Sir John Lawrence, stating that the medical service in Bengal was short twenty officers, and that the deficiency elsewhere was still greater. He believed the Bill in its original form would be of great benefit to India, and he could not, therefore, consent to the addition of the clause proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman.

COLONEL NORTH believed that the argument used by the right hon. Baronet would be a very good one if our own army found no difficulty in obtaining medical officers. But, so far from that being the case, the Government had been compelled to extend the age of admission, first to 25, and latterly to 40; and now they had been compelled to introduce a new class of officers, entitled acting assistant surgeons. The failure in the number of the candidates had partly arisen from the hard and unnecessary examinations which the candidates had been compelled to pass. On a former occasion he had been told that the system would be changed, and an increase of pay given to the medical department. He could not see how the deficiency in the Queen's service could be obviated by the assistant surgeons in that service volunteering into the Indian army.

MR. BRADY said, that if there was any difficulty respecting the supply of medical officers, it might be easily removed. All that was required was that the profession should be treated with more liberality.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY had no fear that the right hon. Gentleman would take any steps prejudicial to the principle of competition. The Bill only gave the Secretary for India power to carry out a step which he thought for the benefit of India. He should support the Bill as it stood.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

The House divided :—Ayes 11 ; Noes 31 : Majority 20.

Bill to be read 3^o on Monday next.

SPAIN AND PERU—THE CHINCHA ISLANDS.—QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is aware if the seizure of the Chincha Islands by Spain has led to demonstrations of sympathy, or offers of material aid, in favour of Peru, on the part of any and what other States of South America; and if he is aware whether the Republic of Equador has proffered the use of the Harbour of Guayaquil or other assistance to the Spanish authorities?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that the seizure of the Chincha Islands had, no doubt, caused great excitement and demonstrations of sympathy among the other States of South America, and he believed that one or two of these States, including Venezuela, had declared that if these Islands were permanently taken possession of by Spain they were prepared to give material aid to Peru. But the Spanish Government stated they had no intention of retaining the Islands, and that as soon as certain claims which they had upon the Peruvian Government were satisfied, they would restore them to their original owners. He understood that the Republic of Equador had offered the use of the Harbour of Guayaquil to both parties for the purpose of coaling and refitting their vessels.

VANCOUVER'S ISLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he has received a Despatch from the Governor of Vancouver's Island, conveying a Resolution of the Legislature to the effect that the offer of the Imperial Government to transfer to the Colony the Crown Lands did not afford an equivalent for the Civil List asked; if it is true that the Legislature has refused to provide the necessary residence for the Governor; and whether any representations from Vancouver's Island have been made to the Colonial Office respecting the Indenture of 1862, by which the Imperial Government confirmed to the Hudson's Bay Company the appropriations of Lands and Minerals which the Company had made on that Island?

MR. CARDWELL replied that he had received a despatch from Vancouver's Island, containing the expression of a desire on the part of the Colony that it should be more or less closely united with British Columbia, for the purpose of saving expense. The answer of British Columbia upon that subject had not yet been received, but he had reason to believe that that answer was not likely to be a favourable one. He did not despair that the Representatives of Vancouver's Island would yet enter into a proper arrangement with the Governor.

ARMY—THE ARMSTRONG GUNS IN NEW ZEALAND.—QUESTION.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, If, during the recent conflict in New Zealand, the Troops were not exposed to considerable danger during the bombardment by the dropping of the lead coating of the Armstrong shells?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he had not received notice of the Question of the hon. Member in sufficient time to enable him to refer to the papers relating to the subject. But he had been informed by a person who had seen the despatch from the Officer commanding the Royal Artillery at the last battle in New Zealand, that it contained no mention of any such occurrence as that stated by the hon. Gentleman. It appeared, on the contrary, that no Armstrong guns had been used by the Royal Artillery upon that occasion. But it was true that one 110-pounder and two 40-pounder Armstrong guns had been used by the Naval Brigade; and his noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty might have received some information upon that subject. A private letter had been received from Sir William Wiseman, who commanded the naval force upon that occasion, and in that letter the performance of those guns was spoken of in the highest terms.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, that he would on Monday put a Question upon that subject to the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty.

TURKEY—PRINCE COUZA AND THE PORTE.—QUESTION.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government has itself expressed, or allowed Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople to express, either directly or indirectly, any approval of the recent coup d'état of Prince Couza, or of any arrangements into which he has entered with the Porte, in so far as these arrangements are contrary to the Convention of 1858; and whether, if there are any papers on the subject, he would object to lay them upon the table of the House?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that neither the Government nor the British Ambassador at Constantinople had expressed directly or indirectly approval of the course taken by Prince Couza. No doubt the change made by that Prince in arbitrary manner in the constitution and laws was opposed to the Convention of 1858; but Prince Couza had been invited to Constantinople, and arrangements had been entered into there with the Sublime Porte, carrying out to a certain extent the views of Prince Couza and other parties in the Principalities. The arrangement that had been come to overthrew what his hon. Friend called the coup d'état of Prince Couza, and terminated the serious complications which had in consequence arisen in the Principalities. Sir Henry Bulwer deserved great credit for the manner in which he had brought about this settlement, for it was mainly due to him. With regard to papers, he could not at present lay any on the table. There would require to be a new Convention, to which all would have to be parties who were parties to the old Convention, and when it was concluded he would lay that and other papers before the House.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he wished to know, Whether Sir Henry Bulwer has given no approval to the coup d'état?

MR. LAYARD: None whatever.

Afterwards—

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask, Whether it was to be understood that the arrangement to which the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had alluded was entered into between Prince Couza and the Porte alone, or whether it was referred to the other Powers?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that the arrangement come to at Constantinople in regard to the Principalities received the sanction of all the parties who had to do with the Convention of Paris.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE—KAFFIR WAR.

QUESTION.

MR. WARNER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, since the last war at the Cape of Good Hope, any arrangement has been come to with the Colonial Government as to the expenses of possible future wars; or whether, in the event of war with the Natives, the Imperial Government would be exposed to the same risk now as on former occasions of being compelled to bear the greater part of the burden?

MR. CARDWELL replied, that no arrangement had been come to with the Colony of the nature referred to by the hon. Gentleman. Perhaps the House would be interested to know that he had that day received a despatch from the Governor of the Cape, which was to the following effect:—

“You will be gratified to find that the expectations I had formed of the continuance of tranquillity were well founded. You may rest assured that I will spare no pains to overcome by all legitimate means the feelings of distrust and discontent by which some of the Chiefs appear to be animated. Since I last wrote the Commander of the Forces has arrived in Grahamstown, and agrees with me as to the inexpediency of any advance by the troops.”

The despatch is dated Grahamstown, June 16.

In reply to MR. ARTHUR MILLS,

MR. CARDWELL said, that there was no reference in that despatch to the annexation of any new territory, but there was in other papers.

THE WINE LICENSING SYSTEM.

QUESTION.

MR. COX said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will next Session bring in a Bill making it compulsory on Magistrates who, sitting in Petty Sessions, refused an application for a “Gladstone” Wine Licence, to state the grounds of their refusal, so that their decision may be appealed from to the Quarter Sessions?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that the reasons were now stated for refusing such an application; and the only question was, whether an appeal should be granted on the occasion of a first application. He had communicated with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the subject, and he thought it right that such an appeal should be allowed.

WAR IN NEW ZEALAND.

QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will lay on the table before the Prorogation the Despatches from New Zealand not already published; and whether, by the last mail, he has received a copy of a Proclamation on the part of the local Government which threatened the rebels with severe penalties?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that no copy of any Proclamation was enclosed in the latest despatches. A notification had, however, been received which led him to believe that a Proclamation of a different nature from that referred to by the hon. Member, and calculated to satisfy the Natives, was about to be issued. The despatches would be laid on the table as soon as possible.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will, at the rising of the House this day, adjourn till Monday next."

GOVERNMENT MANUFACTURING ESTABLISHMENTS.—RESOLUTIONS.

MR. COBDEN * rose to move certain Resolutions in regard to the great extension of the Government Manufacturing Establishments. He said, I regret that, owing to the necessity which lay on many of us to postpone the notices of Motions which we had on the paper a fortnight ago, I was not able to bring this subject earlier under the notice of the House. The Question is important, not only in a financial sense, but in its bearings on the defence and security of the nation. In advocating the view that the Government of the country should not undertake to manufacture for itself that which can be purchased from private producers, I am advancing no new doctrine in this House. On the contrary, this has always been the policy of the House, and the opposite system pursued during the last few years has been in defiance of the reiterated expressions of the opinion of Parliament. I might go back to the celebrated speech of Edmund Burke on economical reform, who so long ago as 1780 laid down in language which it is impossible to surpass, the reasons why the Government should not resort to the manufacture of its own supplies, but should depend on the competition of individual manufacturers. In 1828, before the Reform era, a Committee of the House of Commons put forth a Report in which there is a paragraph to this effect—

"The Committee are not disposed to place implicit reliance on the arguments which have been urged by some public departments against contracts by competition, and in favour of work by themselves. The latter plan occasions the employment of a great many officers, clerks, artificers, and workmen, and not only adds to the patronage, but to the appearance of the importance of a department. Nor can the Committee suffer themselves to feel any prejudice against the contract system, by references to some instances of failure. They believe that most cases of failure may be attributed to negligence or ignorance in the management of contracts, rather than to the system itself."

Now here is the gist of all I have to say. I shall only amplify this passage, and in doing so I hope I shall not be accused of more illiberality towards the officials than was exhibited by the Committee of 1828. On various occasions this question has been partially raised in reference to particular articles, and an exceptional ground has always been alleged why we should give, for some special branch of production, a preference to the Government manufactories. The consequence has been that step by step the departments have taken upon themselves an immense increase of manufacture. I have asked myself how is it that while we have for twenty years, in our commercial policy, been acting on the principle of unrestricted competition, believing that that is the only way to secure excellence and stability of production, and when the private industry of the country is more equal than ever it was to the demands of the Government, how is it that the departments have been allowed to raise up these gigantic Government monopolies? I believe it is in consequence of the weakness of the Executive Government. For many years past there has, I fear, been very little control exercised by the Treasury, over the various departments of the Government, and the rein being loosened the heads of departments have taken the power into their own hands, and embarked in vast manufacturing undertakings, contrary as I cannot but believe to the intention of this House and the country. The result of my experience is, that there is little use in the House undertaking by Committees to correct the failures of the Executive Government. By interfering in the management of the details of the Government you infallibly do more harm than good. You lower the Executive in the estimation of the permanent officials; and you attempt what is impossible, for the departments laugh at the idea of Parliament superintending the details of the administration. Moreover, the Government by allowing Parliament to attempt to control these details, virtually abandons its own duties and responsibilities. During the last few years we have had Committees of this House on

Ordnance, on plating ships, and on various other branches of Executive administration connected with the safety and defence of the country. In the early years of my experience in Parliament, when Sir Robert Peel was Prime Minister, he would have resisted the appointment of such Committees as tantamount to a Vote of Want of Confidence. He would have said, "If you think the administration is not satisfactorily conducted by me, then you must find somebody else to undertake it." My view is that the House can interfere with great advantage in prescribing the principles on which the Executive Government shall be carried on; but beyond that it is impossible for the Legislature to interfere with advantage in the details of the administration of the country. The principle I advocate is that the Government should not be allowed to manufacture for itself any article which can be obtained from private producers in a competitive market; and that, if we have entered on a false system in this respect, we ought, as far as possible, to retrace our steps.

To give the House an idea of the extent to which the system of which I complain has grown, I will quote a few figures. In 1849-50 I sat upon a Committee to inquire into the Ordnance, and we found that the whole amount of wages then paid to artificers and labourers in the United Kingdom and the Colonies on the Ordnance Votes was £141,330. This year I find that we have voted in corresponding Votes for the wages of our manufacturing establishments, including the clothing factories, a sum of £584,000, being more than four times the amount of the sum voted in 1849-50. The wages voted for the gun factory at Woolwich this year were £144,000, which exceeded the wages for all the departments in 1849-50. Down to and including the Crimean war, the British Government never cast an iron cannon, or made shot or shell. Our ordnance was purchased from the Carron Works in Scotland, from the Low Moor Company, or from the Gospel Oak Works of Messrs. Walker. At the outbreak of the Crimean war my right hon. Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell) was Secretary to the Ordnance, and I am afraid that I must charge him with having deposited the nest-egg which has produced the pernicious brood of which I am complaining. From the evidence given by the right hon. Gentleman himself in 1854, I find that he and Captain Boxer of the Laboratory Department at Woolwich laid their heads together and said, "If we spend £7,000 in putting up machinery we can make our own fuses and bouches our own shells." That was the beginning of those acres of costly machinery which may now be seen at Woolwich. No very long time elapsed before Captain Boxer said, "We are now prepared for making fuses and bouching faster than we can get shells; therefore, let us make shells," and accordingly they laid out £10,000 in the erection of machinery for casting shells and shot. There is a very interesting narrative in the evidence before the Sebastopol Committee, and I find that the right hon. Gentleman was arraigned before that Committee for acting without the consent of his Colleagues. I do not blame him for that. We were at war, and he and Captain Boxer displayed a commendable energy; but I mention these facts to show you how establishments of this kind grow. The next step, after setting up machinery for casting shot and shell, was to erect turning and boring machinery for making the guns. It was resolved that instead of obtaining cast-iron cannon from the Low Moor Company, they should purchase from that concern solid blocks of iron, and bore and turn them at Woolwich. Another suggestion immediately followed:—"We had better cast our own guns rather than buy these blocks from Low Moor," and so the machinery was set up for that. Now came a difficulty. There are, as I have said, but two or three concerns in England from which it is safe to buy ordnance, of which the Low Moor Works are one, and the Gospel Oak Works of Messrs. Walker another. When casting a 68-pounder at Low Moor they not only take selected qualities of their own iron, good as it is, but they use coal of a particular kind, fresh from the earth, to smelt it. That firm would not sell pig-iron to the Woolwich establishment, and the result was that, having got the machinery for casting the guns, there was no iron fit to cast. They went into the market and purchased the ordinary kind of pig iron, and they made about 100 guns, but it is believed that not one of the hundred ever went into the service. They were pronounced rotten and were never used. After £200,000 had been spent in this way, the establishment at Woolwich for casting guns was abandoned.

Then came the second part of the performance. It had become necessary that the Government should obtain a supply of rifled cannon. No sooner did this necessity arise than there were men of genius such as Mr. Whitworth, Sir William Armstrong, Captain Blakeley, Mr. Lancaster, and Mr. Lynall Thomas preparing to supply the want. The reasonable course would have been to have said to these inventors, "Go on and improve your system. Manufacture some guns, and to whichever is most successful, we will be your customer;" but the establishment at Woolwich wished to secure the manufacture of rifled ordnance, and those in authority—some of them in very high authority—seem to have lost their heads altogether, and to have gone almost crazy over Sir William Armstrong's gun. An illustrious Duke is reported to have said that Sir William Armstrong's gun could all but speak, and another eminent officer declared it was equal to anything in the tales of the Arabian Nights. I will venture to offer a suggestion. When we have in future to make a choice of ordnance, our high officials in the army should pursue the same course they do when they hold a court-martial—let the younger officers speak first—because when the Commander-in-Chief utters such an emphatic approbation it is hardly likely that junior officers will be found to dissent. I would further suggest that the authorities should in these matters follow the commercial system, and not begin to praise and puff an article before they buy it. The result in this instance was, that Sir William Armstrong—then Mr. Armstrong—resolved to make a present of his patent to the War Office. And a very costly present it was. It was assigned over to the Secretary for War, and an arrangement was entered into which to this day I can hardly understand. It seems that Sir William Armstrong was to receive, for ten years, a sum of £2,000 a year for superintending the working of the patent. That arrangement was antedated three years, and £6,000 was paid down, upon which he became superintendent of the Royal gun factory, and chief engineer of the rifled ordnance department. A business was set up at Elswick, in Northumberland, by the War Office—an establishment which previously belonged to Sir William Armstrong—and we made advances in a mysterious manner to the extent of £85,000. Immediately afterwards our officials at Woolwich set up a manufactory of the same kind, and they set it up apparently with a view of controlling the price at

Elswick. It is most amusing to see the naïveté with which the leading men at Woolwich came before the Committee appointed by this House, and tried to show that they were producing the gun cheaper at Woolwich than at Elswick, forgetting that the two were one and the same concern; that they were both started by the Government with the nation's capital. The Committee were evidently unable to understand the accounts of the Woolwich factory, and in their report they passed a resolution begging them to amend them. I believe that the right hon. Member for Limerick will admit that this is a fair statement of the origin and progress of the rifled Armstrong gun. It was to be made of wrought-iron, was to be breech-loading, and built up on the coil principle with bars of forged iron. It is no disparagement to Sir William Armstrong, who is a man of great mechanical genius, to say that the general impression of scientific men has been unfavourable to his invention—unfavourable to the breech-loading principle, and unfavourable to the material of which he proposed to construct his gun. But the point to which I desire to call the especial attention of the House is this, that the Government set up a manufacture and installed as its head the author and patentee of a particular gun. The consequence was that Mr. Whitworth, who was then in the field, found that he had virtually to submit his gun to the inspection and approval of his great rival. There were other men as well who were candidates, but I mention Mr. Whitworth especially, because every one who knows him will allow that he is one of the very foremost practical mechanicians of the age, and everybody will admit that any system which excluded that gentleman from competition in a matter to which he had devoted his attention must be a wrong system. It was not merely the mechanicians who were thus excluded. The general impression was, and is, that the great problem to solve is not so much a pattern of rifling or a form of gun, as the material from which a gun is to be made; and we have for the last ten years been travelling in a direction which will no doubt ultimately land us in this position, that we shall have it in our power, whenever we find it advantageous, to apply steel to every purpose for which we now use iron. Mr. Bessemer was in the field with his invention for cheapening steel. We have it in evidence before the Committee on Ordnance, from Captain Scott, that Mr. Bessemer told him he should have liked the Government to try his principle of homogeneous metal, which he and many others believe will be found better than wrought iron, but that when he found Sir William Armstrong in possession he gave up the idea. There is also evidence that the Messrs. Walker, of Gospel Oak Works, who produced some of the best cast iron guns, made the same remark, that finding Sir William Armstrong in possession, they should abandon the manufacture of guns. Well, a Committee of this House upon Ordnance was appointed and sat in 1862-3, and I must say that on reading the details of the evidence taken before it I was astonished at the levity with which that evidence was allowed to pass into oblivion without having been brought under the notice of the House. I call my right hon. Friend the Member for Limerick, who was Chairman of the Committee, to account for the omission; and the other Members of the Committee are not altogether without blame. The evidence adduced before that Committee was of the most important and even the most portentous character; for it transpired that we had between 2,500 and 3,000 guns upon the principle of Sir William Armstrong; that there is a confessed expenditure of 2½ millions on these guns; but I believe it was very much more; and it was admitted that 100 of these guns, of the largest size, were made before a trial or experiment was entered into. That there may be no cavilling about what the result of that Committee was, I will read a few words. The Duke of Somerset, the head of the Admiralty, in his evidence said last year—

"The whole science of gunnery is in a transition state, and when I was this year asked what gun I approved for the navy I was obliged to say that I really did not know."

Recollect, this was after nearly 3,000 guns had been made on the Armstrong principle. His Grace also declared that we had nothing better now for close quarters than the old 68-pounder made at the Low Moor Works. And the Committee report—unanimously, I suppose—that the old 68-pounder is, therefore, the most effective gun in the service against iron plates. The Committee finally say—

"The Armstrong 12-pounders, although stated by some of the witnesses to be too complicated a weapon for service, are generally approved; but that "the preponderance of opinion seems to be against any breech-loading system for larger guns."

They recommend that the different systems should be experimented upon. And they also recommend that the accounts of the Woolwich gun factory should be kept in a more intelligible manner. ["No!"] These are not their words, but that is their sense. They say they cannot understand the accounts. I would just add a few words from a naval officer who has given considerable attention to this matter. Writing on the 30th of last June, Admiral Halstead thus summed up—

"The result is that the largest and most costly fleet of the world, intrusted with the security of the largest maritime empire, has long been presented to all but England's eyes without a gun fit for the special warfare of the day, and with special guns fit for no warfare whatever."

I ask, is that a satisfactory state of things in which to find ourselves after spending, perhaps, three millions of money, and making nearly 3,000 of these guns? Admiral Halstead, in another letter, calls this "the great blind jump of 1859." What has been the result of the Committee? The consequence is that you have had set up at Shoeburyness a stunning competitive contest between Sir William Armstrong and Mr. Whitworth; and thus, after this vast outlay of public money upon the invention of one of the competitors, you are trying which of the two has got the best gun. There might, however, be some consolation in this, if the Armstrong guns were now really being tried against Mr. Whitworth's; but what is the fact? If I am rightly informed, the original gun which we took up and have got in stock—that is, the service gun—is not the gun which Sir William Armstrong is trying. I am told that the original breech-loader, of which we have nearly 3,000 on hand, has been abandoned in this competition, and that there is another gun of an improved construction substituted. I saw it stated in a report of the trial in The Times the other day that the original breech-loader is withdrawn from the competition. That is not a very consolatory circumstance in the condition in which we find ourselves. I beg the House to consider what is meant when we are told that we have no naval gun. We have 12-pounders for the field if we chose to go to war in New Zealand or China; but you are not to reckon on the contingency of an enemy landing here to fight you. When I speak of your having no naval guns, I mean guns to fight with. I observe that Captain Cowper Coles talks of the Armstrong 110-pounder as something to do for a chase, or, in nautical phrase, "to tickle up a runaway." Now, let us realize the full force of the admission that we have no gun adapted for modern naval warfare. The hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Caird) stated the other day—and we could have no higher authority—that half the people of this country during the last three years have been fed with grain and food brought from abroad. We are in the position of a garrison depending for subsistence upon our communications being kept open. If after all your expenditure you have no guns for your ships to contend with against an enemy, do you suppose that your foe would be so foolish as to attempt an invasion with a view of fighting you on land? No, if they had the command of the sea they would blockade us and starve us into submission. Our life as a nation depends on our having the mastery of our communications by sea. And yet this is the way in which those who govern us take care to keep open our communications. Well, the whole secret of the failure is this:—The Government do not understand the functions of a buyer; the whole difficulty of their position arises from their not being able to fulfil the duty of a purchaser, in a common-sense and judicious manner. The true course to have pursued with all these scientific men, when they came with their improvements in artillery, was to have encouraged them to go on, and to have promised their custom to the most successful, or, perhaps, a very small amount of help at starting. I believe that Sir William Armstrong only asked for £12,000 to begin with, and that Mr. Bessemer would have commenced making his steel guns with £10,000; and I have no doubt that for less than £100,000 the Government might have set half-a-dozen establishments to work, competing for the prize of supplying them with guns. That is a matter which the Government will never comprehend till this House insists that they shall buy their commodities instead of making them. If they are not capable of buying their commodities in the market, do you suppose they are competent to fulfil the far more difficult task of manufacturing them? I wish to show you the position in which we, as a nation, are placed by these proceedings. We are in danger of seeing foreigners supplied with better armaments than ourselves from our own private workshops. The very individuals whom the Government have rejected and would not have dealings with have set up manufactories of ordnance for themselves. Mr. Whitworth has founded an ordnance company for the manufacture of guns. I am told that Sir William Armstrong, having closed his connection with the Government at Elswick, and received £65,000 as compensation, has set up a manufactory of guns at Elswick; and, being no longer connected with the Government, I am told that he is actually manufacturing his 600-pounders for Foreign countries. Within a quarter of an hour's drive from this spot, I saw, a few days ago, an establishment where steel guns—600-pounders—are being bored; and this firm, which was rejected by the Government, is, I am told, receiving orders for these monster guns by the dozen, while you are in this experimental mood down at Shoburness over the 70-pounder and the 110-pounder. I have now said all that I intend to say respecting this gigantic ordnance failure.

Then, as a still farther proof of the necessity for the Government to know how to exercise the functions of a buyer, let me refer to small arms as an illustration. Down to about ten years ago, we bought all our muskets from contractors. The Government did not make a rifle even during the Crimean war. I may here remark that the ordnance supplied during the Crimean war was of a very satisfactory character. The ordnance and small arms were supplied by private contractors to the army and navy, and they were spoken of in the highest terms in the Report of the Sebastopol Committee of 1855, which, at the same time, contained condemnations of the commissariat, of the medical, and other departments. As I have said, previous to 1855 we bought our small arms from private contractors. How does the House think the Government managed their purchases? I mention this as an illustration of their incompetency as a buyer. If hon. Members refer to the evidence given before the Small Arms Committee of 1854 they will find that the Government were in the habit of buying their muskets in component parts. They contracted, at Birmingham and Wednesbury and other places, for the stock with one maker, for the barrel with another, for the lock with a third, and so on, until they had about a dozen separate contracts for the component parts of a musket. All those various parts were sent to the Ordnance Depot, and from that depot they were given out to a distinct body of contractors, named "setters up," who fitted them together and made up the musket. Thus they who completed the musket never came in contact with the contractors for the component parts — a system most ingeniously contrived to prevent all improvement. Mr. Whitworth and Mr. Nasmyth, both eminent men, who were examined before the Committee, spoke of the absurdity of this practice, when large capitalists were ready to undertake to supply the completed article. The Government complained that they could not get muskets fast enough, because there were sometimes strikes among the workmen. They were asked in return, "Why do you not give orders to capitalists, who will set up machinery for making the entire musket?" and it was shown that the system of contracting for the separate parts multiplied the risk of delays from strikes, because if, for instance, the men struck who made the locks, they put a stop to the supply of the complete musket. The Government, however, could not be made to comprehend this, and what was the remedy they proposed for the grievance of which they complained? Instead of improving their mode of purchasing, they thought it would be easier for them to manufacture muskets, and therefore the Ordnance Department came before the Committee of 1854 with a plan for erecting an enormous Government manufactory of rifled small arms at Enfield. The Committee were decidedly against that project, and I am glad to see present the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, who was a Member of that Committee. They said, "If you wish to see better machinery introduced for the manufacture of small arms, that is one question; but it is quite distinct from the question whether you are to have a Government factory;" and, in their Report, they speak decidedly against the Government setting up this enormous establishment, because, they say, you will thereby extinguish private trade, which it would be well to preserve for your future necessities. The result was that the Government sent to America to procure machinery. Colonel Colt, the American, had been in this country for twelve months at that time, and he had set up his machinery; but the Government rather than encourage a Birmingham or a London house to enter into the trade to supply them, rushed into what has become the Enfield rifle manufactory. That establishment which then contained sixty or seventy workpeople has since grown into the employment of from 1,200 to 1,500. I am not about to contend that the rifle factory at Enfield has, up to the present time, done its work badly, or that it has not been profitable. If you set up machinery which is almost self-acting, and if you give it constant employment, it is not easy to make a concern otherwise than profitable; but, while doing this, you have been driving out of the trade all those who would have set up the manufacture upon an independent and more durable basis. But the future of this establishment cannot be estimated from the past, for what is now becoming the fate of the Enfield factory? You have no longer full work for it, for you cannot continue to make the one pattern which you have been continuously at work upon—the pattern of 1853. A Committee has decided that Mr. Lancaster's rifle is a better weapon; public competition showed that Mr. Whitworth's was superior; and the consequence has been that the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) has moved, in the present Session, the rejection of the Estimate for making Enfield rifles, because they were of an inferior kind, and therefore the manufacture ought to be suspended. If, then, these rifles are to be discontinued, and others are to be made, you will be confronted with the difficulties which await you in every Government manufactory where you are your own and your only customer. During this transition period, as your production falls off, the cost of each article increases, owing to the larger proportion of the permanent fixed charges which it has to bear. To evade this, and also in order to find employment for your workpeople, you will always be liable to the temptation of going on making things which you do not want, in order to employ the people about you, and the result will be that you will be overstocked with articles which your better judgment would induce you not to buy, if you had to purchase them in the market from private producers.

I have said I do not mean to argue that making one article, and having constant employment, this Enfield establishment has not paid itself. But here are the balance-sheets relating to the rifle factory and the gunpowder manufactory adjoining, which have been laid upon the table, and upon which I wish to make one or two observations. I see they are signed "Hartington," as Under Secretary for War, but I would advise the noble Lord not to put his name to any more of these balance-sheets, as I can assure him they would not pass the Bankruptcy Court. They are not creditable to him, and they are still more discreditable to a commercial nation like this, of which he is a representative. I wish to call attention to some facts connected with these balance-sheets. In that which is dated the 31st of March, 1863, it is stated that the articles produced in the year cost at Enfield £199,177, while if they had been purchased from the trade the cost would have been £356,378, showing a saving of £157,201. Among the items are 71,590 rifles, for which it was stated the private trade would charge 63s. 1d. each. Now, a gentleman who is at the head of the trade in Birmingham informs me that a tender was actually made this year to the Government to supply rifles at 50s. each, or 13s. 1d. less than it is said the private trader would charge. Then, again, it is stated that 13,780 short rifles made at Enfield would have cost 94s. 7d. if bought of the private trade. The same gentleman informs me that a contract was made last January for the Turkish Government through our War Office, to supply the same weapons at 65s. 9d., or 28s. 10d. less than is said here to be the trade cost. Then there are 13,000 carbines put down as costing 63s. 7d. in the private trade, but which this gentleman tells me could have been had for 50s. The amount of these overcharges upon these three items alone is £75,000. It may be objected that the balance-sheet is for 1862-3, while the prices of the private trade which I have quoted are for this year. I put that point to the gentleman on whose authority I have spoken, and he said the articles might have been had at about the same price last year, if anybody had applied for them.

I find that you can never make the conductors of these Government establishments understand that the capital they have to deal with is really money. How should it be real money to them? It costs them nothing, and whether they make a profit or a loss they never find their way into the Gazette. Therefore to them it is a myth—it is a reality only to the taxpayers. Throughout the inquiries before Parliamentary Committees upon our Government manufactories, you find yourselves in a difficulty directly you try to make the gentlemen at the head of these establishments understand that they must pay interest for capital, rent for land, as well as allow for depreciation of machinery and plant. There is an immense capital employed in the Enfield Rifle Manufactory. The fixed and floating capital invested in materials, buildings, machinery, and land, appears from the balance-sheet to amount to £350,000. The private manufacturer, of course, in the shape of either rent or interest, would charge himself on the whole of the amount, or if he did not he would soon find himself in the Gazette. There is more than want of self-respect in the departments which publish such accounts. It is an insult and an outrage to private trade to pretend to show by such fallacious balance-sheets how much the articles cost, and how much they would have cost if they had been bought of private traders, and to make it appear that we have had all these rifles for £199,177, while if we had bought them of private traders we should have had to pay £356,378, or £157,201 more. The whole amount of wages paid during the year was £135,700, and we are asked to believe that there has been a saving of £157,201 as compared with what would have been paid to private manufacturers. Now, we all know that for everything but labour the Government go to the same source of supply as private manufacturers do. They have not as yet established coal or iron mines of their own, and for all raw materials they have to go into the market and buy on the same terms as private establishments buy. Yet the Enfield Rifle Factory professes to have saved more than the whole amount spent in wages during the year! We all remember the story of the two gipsies who sold brooms. Says one of them to the other, "I can't conceive how you afford to sell your brooms cheaper than I do, for I steal all my materials." "Ah!" says the other, "but I steal the brooms ready-made." Now I should like to know from the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), whom I shall persist in holding responsible for these accounts, to which he has appended his name, how he manages this great feat of commercial legerdemain.

Turning over two pages in this Report on the Government factories, I come to the Waltham Abbey Powder Manufactory. That is an establishment with 160 acres of land upon which they profess to grow wood for their charcoal, with water-power of immense extent, with large buildings for business and for dwellings, and, of course, with a great amount of machinery. Their business is not a large one. They return themselves as having produced in the year 14,526 barrels of powder, which they value at £34,747. Then, after the usual memorandum that this is exclusive of interest of capital, depreciation of plant, &c., they show that these 14,526 barrels of gunpowder if supplied by private makers would have cost £79,933, so that they have effected for the Government a saving of £45,185. Now I say, that for a country calling itself a commercial nation to have such accounts published and signed "Hartington" is monstrous; and it only shows the utter valuelessness of anything that the noble Marquess may say at that table on this subject. The noble Marquess has shown that he possesses too much ability to make these statements on his own authority; but it is clear that he recites anything that is put into his hands, and therefore what he may say at the table is not worth the slightest attention. Now, let us see how all this is managed. The capital represented by buildings, water-power, machinery, and rolling stock is £300,000, and no interest is charged on that. The land is worth £20,000, but there is no item for rent. Nothing is allowed for rates and taxes, and nothing for insurance. Now, I asked a very well-informed gentleman what the custom was in the private trade with regard to the charge for insurance on a gunpowder manufactory. Of course the Royal Exchange, or the Phoenix Company, would not like such risks. So I find that private traders are in the habit of allowing about 25 per cent for insurance. Nothing of the sort is allowed for here. Enough has probably been said to show that the system on which these Government manufactories are conducted is wholly unsound, that there is an utter absence of responsibility, that there are none of those motives for saving money or avoiding losses which private individuals have; and that, wanting the motives which are necessary for human action, it is impossible that these establishments can be carried on properly.

Let me just touch for a minute upon another matter—the great clothing establishments. Earl De Grey and Ripon, as the head of the War Department, is not only the largest manufacturer of ordnance and of small arms, but he is the most extensive tailor in the world. [Laughter.] You laugh, but all these tailoring transactions are carried on in his name, and he is responsible for everything. [Laughter.] You laugh at the idea that Lord De Grey should overlook all these details; but is it not a serious thing for the country to have an immense business of this kind carried on virtually without control? About ten years ago, the system of clothing the army was changed, and instead of clothing-colonels we had clothing by contract. For a few years that system continued, and the right hon. Gentleman (General Peel) introduced an improvement in the purchasing department. Down to this time the custom was to contract for the clothing by piece-meal, getting the buttons, braiding, and clothing separately; but the gallant Officer had contracts made for the whole garment. We were told in evidence before the Army Organization Committee by the gallant Officer, by the Commander-in-Chief, and by another witness, that the system worked very well. But there was a plot all this while to divert the manufacture of army clothing from private makers into the hands of Government officials. The plot was stealthily carried out. A small establishment was first set up at Woolwich for making clothes for the Artillery and Engineers. That establishment was to go no further. Then a small manufactory was started at Vauxhall for making clothing for the Guards. As one more illustration of the fallacious grounds on which these Government manufactories are established, I will give a brief extract from the evidence given before the Committee on Contracts, which sat in 1858, by Sir Benjamin Hawes, then permanent Under Secretary at the War Office—and we all know that a permanent official often knows more than his chief. He handed in what he was told to give as the cost price of a soldier's garment. There happened to be a man of business on the Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyne (Mr. Jackson), and he, mistrusting the calculation, took the subject in hand, and cross-questioned the witness—

"You have given the Committee the actual cost to the Government of the clothing and the making of the clothing for one man?—Yes. Independent of all departmental charges, and so forth?—Yes. These charges would be plus salaries?—Yes. Plus interest of capital?—Certainly. Plus rent?—Certainly. Plus damage and every other contingency?—Yes. And carriage and ink, and pens and paper, and all necessities for conducting the business?—Yes. Therefore that is not a fair return of what it costs the nation, because if you have to pay those charges in addition, those prices are not the actual cost to the country?—They are not. So that the return is a fallacious one?—It is not a complete one."

I will read another extract from the evidence of the same witness. In justice to my late friend, Sir Benjamin Hawes, I must add that he never contemplated the creation of a Government clothing establishment on its present gigantic scale. Alluding to the manufactory of clothing for the Guards, which had been established the previous year at Vauxhall, he recommended only a slight extension of the factory, so as to supply a regiment or two of the Line. He is asked—

"As I understand you, it is not proposed that that establishment should be extended so far as to make all the clothing for the army, but only a portion of the clothing of certain regiments, in order to give you a test as to the price?—Certainly; I hope never to see a great Government establishment for clothing the army. The more such establishments are used for the purpose of obtaining information and obtaining models the better; but I look with some apprehension upon all great Government establishments. . . . It is very desirable that a Government establishment should produce the minimum, and the private trade of the country should produce the rest."

At the very time this evidence was being given, when the House would have refused to sanction a large extension of the clothing establishment, the plot was all laid for getting into the hands of the War Department the manufactory of the clothing of the whole army, with a slight exception. An enormous building has been erected at Pimlico—put up, I believe, upon most costly ground, the item of ground-rent being between £2,000 and £3,000 a year—and they now make there the clothing of every regiment, and manufacture everything, with the exception of the tunics, for about fifty battalions, which comprise, perhaps, one-tenth of the whole supply of clothing for the army: I suppose this exception is maintained in order to enable the noble Marquess to tell this House that the Department has not a monopoly. The accounts rendered of this Clothing Department are most fallacious. I find that about £15,000 a year for fixed charges and interest of money have never been brought into the account at all, and that there is no allowance for rates and taxes. Taking into consideration the waste and fraud to which an establishment for a trade like that is so peculiarly susceptible, when the materials used are cut up into pieces, I must say that it is one of the most unwise and injudicious undertakings that could have been entered into. I have already said, you never find with respect to those establishments that anything is put down for rates, taxes, lighting, or charges of that kind. There is a fallacy in this. If the tailoring business is carried on by the Government, somebody else is deprived of it, who would have paid rates and taxes, including the income tax. Let us suppose the extreme case, that all the manufactures of the country were carried on by the Government, and that they were all exempt from taxation, how would the Chancellor of the Exchequer get his revenue?

I now come to the management of the Royal dockyards, to which the remarks I have made apply with greater force than to any other department. We have had repeated debates on that subject, and Committees and Commissions have reported on it without end. The tendency of our debates during the last few years has been to prevent, if possible, the Admiralty from continuing to make things which we knew were of no use—to prevent them from building wooden ships, when everybody knew that iron ships would be wanted—and great three-deckers, when all scientific men were aware that they would be mere slaughter-houses if opposed to modern combustible missiles. What, in the meantime, has been the tendency at the Admiralty? The heads of the dockyards have been endeavouring to counteract Parliament by securing votes for timber in every possible way, and even by buying timber with money voted for iron ships, in order that, having the timber on hand, there may be an excuse for using it for the purpose of building obsolete vessels of war. I have spoken plainly with respect to the right hon. Member for Droitwich and the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty, and I hardly know which to blame the most for bringing in Estimates which they must have known entailed an improper waste of money. I blame the noble Lord most, because I know that he knew better. But, after all, there is probably something to be said on the other side. If you will have these enormous establishments employed for one customer only, you are always in danger, in seasons of transition, of having a great number of workpeople thrown out of employment. This operates on the feelings of humane men, responsible for their subsistence, and induces them, under the guidance of their feelings, and against their better judgment, to manufacture articles which ought not to be made at all. There is no doubt that we have been spending millions of money on the construction of valueless vessels, and that you have from 50 to 100 great wooden ships which ought never to have been in existence, and will never be of any use, but which were in great part built because you have a system which compels you to find employment for your men. If, instead of being builders, you had been buyers of ships, does any one suppose that you would have purchased one of those obsolete and useless wooden vessels? I speak to hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House in the confidence that they will co-operate with me on this occasion. They are said to favour large Votes for the military and naval services. But no party in the House is interested in the waste of public money on these establishments. They find me but little disposed to vote money for the army and navy; but I am always for paying the men well, and I would give them more money than they get now, though I should certainly be satisfied with fewer of them; but you cannot indulge in more liberality towards the men while you tolerate the waste and extravagance of keeping up these large manufacturing establishments; for all these charges come under the head of army and navy, and swell up in the eyes of the country the amount expended on the services.

I wish to ask why we should not take advantage of the present time, when passing from wooden ships to iron ships, and do with the hulls of vessels what you do with your marine steam-engines—buy them, keeping up the Government dockyards only, as far as might be wanted, for repairs. Where would be the risk or inconvenience from such a change? Do you think that the shipbuilders in private yards could not perform the work as satisfactorily as the Admiralty? There are, I believe, at this moment, upwards of 500,000 tons of shipping building in private yards; and during the last year there have been building in this country fifteen ships of war, of an aggregate of nearly 40,000 tons, for the Governments of the following countries:—Denmark, Italy, Spain, Russia, Turkey, China, Prussia, Peru, Portugal, and two rams supposed for the Confederate States. With the exception of a small vessel of 500 tons, which is of wood, all these ships, I am told, are being built of iron. Do you suppose that the private builders who are constructing ships to this enormous extent cannot build the hulls of your vessels of war? Why, you already procure from private manufacturers the most important part of your steamers, that which requires the greatest skill and the most reliable probity in its production. You get your steam-engines wholly from private establishments. I remember sitting on a Committee upon the Navy in 1848, when we were just in time to prevent the Government dockyards from commencing the construction of steam-engines. The rule laid down, and ever since acted upon, was that the Admiralty should repair their engines but not make them. This has been found to succeed most admirably; it is the only branch of your naval construction about which you never hear any complaint. No Committees of this House have been called for, no blue-books have been required, for improving the construction of marine steam-engines. The difficulties in the dockyards have been in connection with the building of the hulls of ships. Why should not the plan which has worked so well with the engines be equally applicable to ships? This is a most opportune time for making the change, just when the armour-clad vessels are coming into use. At the present moment you have no means of making iron-plates for the armour-ships, but I have no doubt that if the House permitted, the authorities of the dockyards would get up plans for having iron rolled in those establishments.

There is an old plea for maintaining these Government establishments upon a small scale, on the ground that you may be able to manufacture a little so as to serve as a test and a check upon contractors. Such a course might have been to some extent unobjectionable formerly, when there were few competitors; but we live now in a time when such a check is unnecessary; for are not great shipbuilders, great gunmakers, and large tailoring establishments, better checks upon each other, through the force of competition, than you can possibly be upon them? If the accounts in the Government establishments are honestly made out, then you will find that the Government, carrying on a small business without the usual motives for economy, produces things at a very dear rate, and the contractors will expect to be paid at this price, which you say should be the model one. If, on the other hand, the accounts are made out like those to which I have referred, and private producers are expected to compete on such terms, then every respectable manufacturer will throw aside the invitations for contracts with disgust and scorn, and refuse to have anything to do with such departments. But is not the fact of the perfect success of your marine engines, without any such check as is proposed, a sufficient answer to this plea? Surely the great waste which we know to have been so long taking place is a sufficient motive for a change. I was talking the other day to an eminent practical shipbuilder on this subject, and this is the substance of what he told me—

“There has been expended in wages to artificers, naval stores, for the building, repairing, and outfitting of the fleet, steam machinery, and ships built by contract, new works, improvements, and repairs in the yards, from 1859 to 1863 inclusive (five years), £24,350,000. Taking into account the values of all the iron-clads built and building, and giving a large sum for useless constructions of wooden ships, and making a liberal allowance for equipment and repairs, still there will be left more than ten millions out of the above sum for the expenditure of which a private shipbuilder could assign no rational purpose.”

I remember the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty saying, some time back, that he could not trace several millions of the Estimates, in any results to be discovered in the dockyards, and I suppose my friend the shipbuilder has been engaged in a similar search.

It has been said that if we retain the powers of production in our Government establishments, and a war breaks out, we shall have the means of bringing all these powers to bear on the preparation of our armaments. There is, I think, a great deal more to be said on that score, in favour of my plan of giving the work to private establishments. If our private shipbuilders were employed by our own as well as by Foreign Governments, then we should have a dozen or a score of large firms engaged in constructing ships of war not only for ourselves, but for half the world. In the same way if the Government merely kept the factory at Woolwich for repairs, or let it, and gave orders to private houses for the supply of their artillery and ammunition, you would have half-a-dozen or half-a-score, as the case might be, of great establishments producing these articles for our own and Foreign Governments. In the present very low state of civilization, in which no country feels itself safe, particularly if a weak Power, but when, fortunately for humanity, there is a principle developing itself in mechanical science which gives a great advantage to those who act on the defensive, especially against an aggressor from a distance, I am inclined to think there would be constantly a very great demand for munitions of war by foreign countries—South America, for instance, Japan, and others, who would arm themselves in order to be safe against attack. And I am not prepared to say they would not do well in thus arming themselves, because the stronger a Power is the less temptation does it offer to outrage. What, then, if you pursued the course I recommend, would be your position? In case of a war breaking out you could prohibit the exportation of ships of war and munitions of war, and you would be instantly put in exclusive possession of the whole of the resources of all the private establishments which were previously working not for you alone, but for Foreign Powers as well; while, on the other hand, the Foreign Governments would find themselves cut off from the supplies on which they had been relying. I can imagine no contrivance by which you could place yourself in so advantageous and economical a state of preparation for war as this.

There is, however, another reason why the two systems of partially manufacturing for yourself as a Government, and partly purchasing from private traders will not harmonize. The heads of your manufacturing departments must virtually be the buyers of such commodities as their departments want. Colonel Dickson, the head of your rifle manufactory at Enfield, or somebody under him, practically makes all the purchases of small arms; and there have been repeated complaints from Birmingham of the unfairness of a rival manufacturer being constituted the “viewer” of the rifles supplied by private contract. At Woolwich there was an extraordinary example of this state of things, when Sir William Armstrong had to judge the quality of the productions of his competitors. The head of a manufacturing department has always an interest in giving a preference to his own productions or inventions, and disparaging those of outside rivals. There was the case, for instance, of Captain Cowper Coles's turret ship. That was the invention of an outside man; and there is no doubt there has been an unseen but a felt reluctance on the part of the dockyard people to carry it out speedily. I live near Portsmouth, and have myself observed what has been going on. It is nearly four years since Captain Coles proposed his plan to the Government. It is more than two years since they began to cut down and plate the Royal Sovereign, in order to convert it into a turret ship. In the meantime Mr. Reed comes into power. I will not say a word in disparagement of that gentleman. I have no doubt he is a man of talent. We, who sometimes complain of routine, have no right to object to an outside man stepping into a high place in the service on account of his assumed abilities. Mr. Reed, however, must be more than a man, he must be an angel, if he did not feel that his importance and value at the head of the construction department of the navy would be enhanced by his producing something which should be better than Captain Cowper Coles's invention, and should be completed earlier. So he sets to work on the Research. I am no authority on these matters; but I hear an universal opinion that Mr. Reed's immovable square battery is anything but an improvement on Captain Cowper Coles's revolving turret. The world have decided that question, as is shown by the course taken in America, and by the orders received here from foreign countries. But what are the facts? Mr. Reed's vessel, the Research, though designed later than that of Captain Cowper Coles, was launched and at sea considerably in advance of the Royal Sovereign. Now, I am not making any attack on individuals; I am only illustrating the working of a system. If instead of a construction department in your dockyards, you had a buying department, then Mr. Reed, or Admiral Robinson, or whoever were the heads of it, would seek out such men as Captain Cowper Coles, or the hon. Member for Birkenhead, and confer with them, would look abroad and avail themselves of inventions and improvements as they arose, without any feelings of rivalry arising from their own personal interest as inventors.

Before I conclude, I must impress on the House the absolute necessity there is for a thorough reform of the buying department of the Government. Do not call it a contract department. That is the old name which was used as an excuse for ignorance and incompetency, when officials gave out contracts according to a red-tape rule, taken, perhaps, from a pigeon-hole where it had lain for fifty years, and scarcely to be understood by the modern manufacturer. If a firm was doing a prosperous business with private customers, it would have nothing to say to such a contract, and it went to some one who had nothing better to do, and who hoped he might possibly make something of it. A person sent me from Manchester a copy of the specification for a tender for tarpauling, in which the most minute particulars were set forth in a tone of dictation, that, if it were not ludicrous from its ignorance, would be really insulting to any respectable manufacturer.

It was just such a circular as a man of large business would throw into his waste-paper basket; and it contained a requirement that the canvas should be sent for inspection before being tarred. So that, as my correspondent said, he was expected to send all the canvas from Lancashire to London, and then to convey it back again, when, if it had been required that a strip should have been left untarred, it would have answered the purpose. Why should they not have devised a means for clearing off part of the tar themselves? This is a specimen of the way in which the Government contracts are entered into. I would have all that altered. But my plan involves no disparagement of the services of those able men now in your employ; you will want all the brains you have in your constructing department (for your buying department. I have no doubt that Colonel Boxer, Mr. Reed, and the other heads of the different manufacturing departments, would make most excellent buyers. If they are not competent for that I would employ men who are, and I would pay them on a far higher scale than you pay the heads of your departments, for you cannot have men fit to be trusted to go into the market and buy things in the way in which they ought to be bought unless they are placed in a position to be above all temptation. Therefore, I would have men of the utmost capacity; but I should lay down this condition, and insist upon it—that if you cannot in England buy what you want, it is you yourselves who are to blame and not the producers of the country. England is now sending abroad £150,000,000 sterling worth of productions every year. There is not a shilling's worth of that produce that would be bought here if it could be obtained better and cheaper elsewhere, and yet it continues to be bought in larger quantities every year. If you hear anything disparaging to our modern mode of conducting business, that such and such articles are not made so strong and durable as they were at former times, laugh at all such shallow criticisms. The manufacturers here produce for others just what they wish to buy, although, in consequence of the more rapid changes of fashion, it is certainly not the habit of our daughters to wear silk dresses of the strength which were worn by their grandmothers. Then I say that, if in a country which produces every year £150,000,000 sterling of manufactured articles for exportation, the Government fail to obtain the £10,000,000 or £15,000,000 sterling worth of goods which they want, be assured that it arises entirely from their incapacity to buy them. You must have men selected for their ability to buy the commodities you want. If you consult such great wholesale houses as Leaf's and Morrison's in the City, whose buyers purchase millions' worth of articles in the course of the year, they will tell you at once, "We can do with comparatively inferior men to sell our goods, but we get the best men we can to buy them."

I will conclude with a remark in reference to the present state of our armaments. When I consider what has been done in the Armstrong guns, and our armaments generally, I regard it as a deep discredit to the Government of the country, and of itself it ought to compel a change in the system. You have invited this disgraceful state of things by undertaking to do that which you ought never to have attempted. We are governed in this country—I do not use the word invidiously—by a class, and it is a very narrow class indeed, which forms the personnel of our administrations. I do not complain of that, inasmuch as our manufacturing and trading community do not seem disposed to educate their sons to compete for the prizes of official life; but I wish you to bear in mind that by such a neglect and mismanagement as you have fallen into in regard to your artillery and ships you may produce the most serious consequences. I know of nothing so calculated some day to produce a democratic revolution as for the proud and combative people of this country to find themselves, in this vital matter of their defence, sacrificed through the mismanagement and neglect of the class to whom, with so much liberality, they have confided the care and future destinies of the country. You have brought this upon yourselves by undertaking to be producers and manufacturers. I advise you in future to place yourselves entirely in dependence upon the private manufacturing resources of the country. If you want gunpowder, artillery, small arms, or the hulls of ships of war, let it be known that you depend upon the private enterprise of the country, and you will get them. At all events you will absolve yourselves from the responsibility of undertaking to do things which you are not competent to do, and you will be entitled to say to the British people, "Our fortunes as a Government and nation are indissolubly united, and we will rise or fall, flourish or fade together, according to the energy, enterprise, and ability of the great body of the manufacturing and industrious community." The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

COLONEL BARTTELOT, in seconding the Motion, begged to thank the hon. Member for Rochdale for the able and temperate manner in which he had brought the subject under the notice of the House. As guardians of the public purse, it was their duty to see that the money voted was properly, fairly, and honestly expended. He thought that the taxpayers of the country would read that debate with pleasure, because they would see that the House was not inattentive to the way in which the Votes were expended by the Government. If they attended to that point the democratic revolution hinted at by the hon. Member would be averted by the independent Members of the House. He wished to call attention not only to the question, whether the money voted by Parliament had been properly expended, but also to the question whether the results of the expenditure were such as the country had a right to expect from the outlay. In the first place, he had to remark, that notwithstanding all the money we had spent, they had not a gun—certainly not a naval gun—such as a great nation like ours ought to have. Considering the amount spent in the dockyards we were not so well provided with iron-clads as we ought to be. Long since the Admiralty were warned that wooden ships would be of little or no use; nevertheless the Admiralty persisted in building them and had neglected to provide a number of iron ships sufficient to cope with the navies of other nations. In 1854 the Duke of Somerset (then Lord Seymour), in speaking on the Ordnance Estimates, stated that the opinion of several Members of the Government was that it was not advisable that the Government should be manufacturers, except to a small extent—that the general system ought to be one of contract, and that no one believed in the cheapness of Government establishments. Circumstances had certainly not changed since then, and what was objectionable in 1854 was quite as objectionable in 1864. Of late years a manufactory had sprung up at Pimlico, upon which a vast sum of money had been expended with the most unsatisfactory results. It was true our infantry regiments were better clothed than they were some years ago; but that might have been as well accomplished by contractors under proper superintendence—the expense was nearly double; and with regard to the cavalry regiments the new system had entirely failed. In Ireland there was a contractor who competed with Pimlico, and whose price for a tunic was 16s. 4d.; but he had been informed that whatever his price might be the Government would produce the article at a penny lower. It was the duty of the House to see whether or not the Government manufactories could manufacture at a cheaper rate than private individuals, and if not to adopt some better arrangement. When the Crimean war broke out numerous establishments of this kind sprung up, owing, in the first instance, to the outcry that arose because the gunboats were found to be rotten. In the panic that existed during the Crimean war recourse was had to contractors for building gunboats. Called upon suddenly, the contractors had to build them of the first wood they could lay hands on. These boats were placed high and dry in the yard at Haslar, and a Vote was taken to put them under cover. He had himself gone to see them, and had put his stick through the bottom of one of them; on which an old man in the yard remarked that that was not wonderful, as the boats were out of their element. So that was a useless expense. It was, he thought, the duty of the House to inquire whether the work done in the Government yards could not be done better and cheaper by our private shipbuilding firms. He thought that the recommendation of the Dockyard Committee deserved attention, and whether instead of increasing their dockyard accommodation, they might not subsidize some of the large shipbuilding concerns, and help them to construct large graving docks. Supposing one of those graving docks to cost £100,000 for a subsidy of £15,000 or so towards that sum, we might easily secure a prior claim to the use of the dock in the event of our going to war. In that way we should possess all the facilities we required for the repair or construction of our men-of-war. No one in that House, with perhaps the exception of the Secretary to the Admiralty, could tell the cost of any ship that was built. No account was laid before the House as to the particulars. The same observation applied to the Ordnance Department, and the Pimlico establishment. They ought to have laid before them such accounts as any private firm would place before its partners every year, showing in all its details the cost of everything manufactured, taking into consideration the outlay upon land, buildings, machinery, and charging 5 per cent for floating capital. Unless that were regularly done, they would have no accurate mode of comparing the cost of the articles made by the Government establishments with the contract prices for the same things. At present the head of each department got the money he wanted—it was expended—and often articles were manufactured which, when peace came, were useless, and were then sold. The taxpayers of the country had a right to know that their money was properly expended. Moreover, unless these public establishments paid taxes the returns would be fallacious, because they interfered with the setting up of private manufactories, which would otherwise have been paying large sums into the Exchequer. The noble Lord the other night lauded himself on account of the prosperity of the country, but the noble Lord had not told them what had been expended during the last five years. During the last five years they had spent £350,000,000. The present Parliament had been called a prodigal Parliament, but that word was more applicable to the Government than to the Parliament. There was ample room for retrenchment and economy, and it was not too late for the Government to mend their ways. Reform and Retrenchment used to be the watchwords of the noble Lord and his Friends. Whatever he did with Reform, he hoped the noble Lord would stand to the principle of a wise retrenchment. If the noble Lord would only turn his attention in that direction he would deserve the thanks not only of the House but of the country.

Moved,

“That the recent great extension of Government manufacturing establishments calls for the attention of the Government. That it is expedient that steps be forthwith taken to place each separate establishment as nearly as possible on the footing of a private manufacturing concern or a public company, by taking a valuation of the fixed and floating capital employed, including the value of the land; and that upon this basis there be an annual stock taking; when, after making all the customary deductions for depreciation of buildings, machinery, and plant, interest of capital, rates and taxes, and other charges, such a price be charged to the Government Departments for articles supplied as shall preserve the capital intact, and that these accounts, with a balance-sheet, be laid annually on the table of this House.”

Mr. MONSELL said, he wished to address a few remarks to the House, as the

hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) had specially alluded to what had occurred during the time he (Mr. Monsell) had the honour of holding office in the War Department. His hon. Friend had passed an indiscriminating censure upon all Government manufacturing establishments. In that sweeping censure he could not concur, because there were marked distinctions between various establishments; but in some points, and especially in that part of his speech which referred to the Armstrong guns, he entirely agreed with him. The question was put to him by the hon. Member for Rochdale, why he, as Chairman of the Committee upon Ordnance, had not brought forward a Motion upon the subject in the present Session? His reply was, that the Government had now done precisely that which, under the circumstances, it appeared to him it was their duty to do—they had entirely abandoned the manufacture of the large guns, and had instituted, as the Committee recommended, a series of experiments in order to find out which was the best gun. It was to be regretted that those experiments had not taken place before the enormous expenditure upon Armstrong guns had been incurred; but as the Government had now taken that course he did not feel himself called upon to make any Motion upon the subject. There was one difficulty which presented itself at the outset of the hon. Gentleman's observations. The hon. Gentleman called in question the accuracy of all the calculations and the balance-sheets that had been submitted by the different departments, and he accused the Treasury of having taken no part in arranging these balance-sheets upon a satisfactory system, so as to reveal to the House the true cost of the articles produced by the different establishments. To that statement he (Mr. Monsell) must give an emphatic denial. In every step he took while he had the honour of holding office—and the amount expended was large, £600,000 in machinery, a large sum in buildings to contain it—in every step he took he had the inappreciable advantage of being in close communication with Sir Charles Trevelyan, who was then at the Treasury, than whom nobody could be more competent to form a judgment on such matters. A Committee was appointed by the Treasury to go to Woolwich to investigate the system of accounts, and after a close inspection they reported it to be entirely satisfactory. He might remark that the Treasury was rather a fault-finding department, not very much disposed to take too favourable a view of the proceedings of other departments. But beyond the Treasury there was an office within the department itself—the Accountant General's office—where every transaction was investigated in the closest manner. In addition to all these examinations a Commission was appointed a few years ago, on which the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Turner) was a member. That Commission thoroughly investigated the system of accounts, and expressed complete satisfaction with them. He had dwelt upon this point because he wished to show that his hon. Friend had no ground for the charge he had made respecting the accounts. The fact was, the hon. Member had got hold of a principle which he considered as of unvarying application, and which he could best illustrate by a reference to Hume's Essay on Miracles. Hume said it was more easy to believe that the evidence was wrong or mistaken than it was to believe that the miracles had occurred; and so the hon. Member for Rochdale declared that it was more easy to believe that all the people who were most conversant with the subject were ignorant and were deceived than it was credible that the Government could manufacture articles in an economical manner, and with benefit to the country. It must strike every one that the question of cost, although important, was not the only, nor even the principal consideration. The real question was this—"Do the manufacturing establishments at Woolwich and Enfield contribute to the honour and dignity of the country; do they add to its strength, and are they to be considered in the same category as iron-clad ships and fortifications? Are they an important part of the defences of the country?" Certain principles had been laid down by his hon. Friend in which he entirely concurred, and one was that articles in ordinary use that were capable of being rapidly produced and effectively tested should be procured as a general rule from the private trade. Again, he quite agreed with his hon. Friend that if Government establishments were not carried on upon a good system they must be failures. But he said that these establishments produced articles that did not enter into ordinary use, and were, as a rule, conducted on good principles. The system laid down when he was in office was the wise system of individual responsibility.

Absolute and entire control was given to the head of each department, who was allowed to select those men whom he considered most fitted for the work on which they were to be employed. His hon. Friend had inferred that Government encouraged manufactories in a great measure in order to obtain patronage. Now, the Government in this instance had given up patronage. They said to the head of the department—"We hold you individually responsible for the work you perform. Choose your own instruments, and remember that after we have given you that authority we have a right to look to you for everything." He admitted that the clothing department, developed to its present extent, sinned against the principle which had been laid down, that the State should not supply articles which could be easily got and tested. In that matter he thought the Government were wrong. As to the accounts, though in his opinion they were well kept, he thought that Parliament ought to be made acquainted with every detail connected with them, and that the watchful eye of Parliament was essential to the working of the system in order to see that the departments did not degenerate into the state they were in before the Crimean war. Now, he thought the best way of answering the charges of his hon. Friend would be to state what was the condition of things at the breaking out of the Crimean war. His hon. Friend had given the House to understand that everything was going on well at that time. Speaking from personal knowledge, he could say that the very reverse was the fact—that the system of having no Government establishment, or very small ones, completely broke down; that the then existing establishments were most inefficient, and that if a war had been carried on demanding any great expenditure of ammunition and of the different appliances of war, the system would have broken down disgracefully, and we should have been very near some serious disaster. With respect to the question whether we were well supplied or not with military stores at that period, he would first refer to the supply of shells. Mr. Anderson, who was then inspector of machinery in the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich, reported that at the commencement of the war the several factories were carried on as a general rule, with most unproductive implements, and he went on to express his belief that the old system was very inadequate to supply the demands of the service. His hon. Friend said that not a single shell manufactured at Woolwich was fired at Sebastopol. This was a complete error. A large number were fired there, and he hoped that they did good service. But now look at the contracts for shot and shell entered into during 1854-5. An order for 200 tons was given, and they were to be delivered in two weeks; but they were really not delivered till January, 1856. A similar agreement was made with another firm, but there was no delivery till June, 1855. Another firm undertook to deliver 150 tons of shot and 150 tons of shell by the 7th of January, 1855, and the same quantity weekly afterwards. The first delivery took place in June, 1855. In another case six months' delay took place. There was no reason to suppose that things were altered now. It might be supposed that in a manufacturing country like ours it would be easy to obtain a sufficient supply of shot and shell. Experience showed that it was not so. We were now secure, for a quantity of shot and shell equal to the whole of that expended at Sebastopol might be produced at Woolwich within six weeks, and the whole of the cartridges fired during the siege might be produced in three weeks. Surely the safety and the influence of this country were increased by such a change? In talking of the expense of keeping up the departments, his hon. Friend had made no allusion to the fact that, as we had the means of producing so readily this vast quantity of matériel, an enormous saving was effected, because it was now no longer necessary to keep such immense supplies in store. When his hon. Friend talked of interest upon machinery and plant and so forth, he might have instanced this saving. Another point to which his hon. Friend referred was the manufactory of small arms at Enfield. He was surprised at his hon. Friend's remarks upon this head, because he thought the whole world acknowledged the complete success of that establishment. His hon. Friend entirely broke down in his attempt to show any error in the calculations at Enfield. As only one article was manufactured there, the calculations were easily made, and unless there was the grossest dishonesty on the part of Colonel Dickson, one of the most honourable of men, the true state of the case must of necessity appear in the balance-sheet. At the breaking out of the Crimean war the difficulty in procuring small arms from the trade in England was such that the Government were obliged to submit to the disgrace of ransacking the world for the purpose of procuring them. They sent to Liège, to America, to St. Etienne. Orders were given for 20,000 small arms within some limited period, and they were not supplied for months and months afterwards. The same difficulty was experienced in getting 2,000 artillery carbines, and an enormous length of time elapsed before they were supplied. He would come now to the question of cost. The Minié rifle manufactured at Enfield cost 37s. 4d.; the contract price for the trade was 65s. His hon. Friend said that some gunmaker had stated that he could produce it for 50s. But had any gunmaker ever done so? If there was, it was only because of the Government establishment at Enfield. Was anybody so "green" as to think that gunmakers, if the Government depended only on them, would not do now what they had done in 1852, 1853, and 1854, and charge the same prices which they had charged then? But his hon. Friend had said, "Oh, but you are going to change your pattern of rifle." However that might be, he could inform his hon. Friend that nothing could be easier than to change the machinery at Enfield in such a way as to produce the new pattern, and that a change of pattern would be attended with much less expense than if the Government had no factory at Enfield. His hon. Friend had talked about the smallness of the establishment prices being caused by the omission from the estimate of the taxes and the rent of the land; but he ought to have put down to the credit of the department the saving which they effected by producing an article for 37s. 4d., which otherwise would cost 65s. When they took into account that on an average 50,000 or 60,000 rifles were made every year and in some years 70,000 or 80,000—[General PEEL: More than that]—it would be found that the saving effected would pay two or three times over for the cost of the factory since it had been established. It was only a one-sided view of things which his hon. Friend took, for he could not believe it possible that an establishment provided with the best machinery could produce the same articles infinitely cheaper than they could be produced at Leeds or Birmingham. That brought him to a very important matter—the cost of shell—and he was glad to see that his hon. Friend had just entered the House. Colonel Boxer had distinctly stated before the Military Organization Committee, of which the right hon. and gallant General (General Peel) was a Member, that in the course of some two or three years there had been a saving in the cost of shells produced at the factory of more than £200,000. Over that Committee presided Sir James Graham, and he was unable to break down Colonel Boxer's evidence on that matter. [Mr. COBDEN: It is ridiculous to compare times of peace and war.] Well, then, his hon. Friend admitted that in time of war Government factories were good things. If not, what did the interruption mean? He maintained that the £200,000 saving had paid three times over for the expenses of the foundry, and whether that saving was effected in time of peace or war made not the slightest difference in the world. As to the contractors, the shell supplied at £9 a ton, they charged £14 for on the breaking out of the war, and then they did not supply as fast as was required. The Woolwich and Enfield establishments were as much a part of our defences as our fortifications and iron-clads. But in the eyes of his hon. Friend everything was black in the Government establishments, and the contractors were white as snow. It was a remarkable fact which was stated by Sir Benjamin Hawes, referring to the time of the Indian mutiny, that the greatly increased power given by the Government establishments had compensated for the absence of stores. He (Mr. Monsell) was therefore borne out in the statement which he had made, that the existence of these factories rendered it unnecessary for us to keep enormous supplies of stores, which otherwise would be indispensable. His hon. Friend then passed to the question of the Armstrong guns. But it had been distinctly proved that, so far from the establishments at Woolwich having been a cause of expense to the country in the production of these guns, both guns and ammunition were produced there more cheaply than at Elswick. Then the hon. Member said that an enormous sum of money had been spent on a cast-iron gun foundry without producing a single serviceable gun. This was not the fact. Only a few cast-iron guns were made, because soon after the foundry was completed the Armstrong gun was introduced into the service, and that with the exception of the moulding and the casting boxes, costing £6,700, the whole of the building, machinery, and so on was applied to the manufacture of the Armstrong gun. The assertion that the cast-iron guns produced there were expensive, because just at the time they were getting into work the system was changed, was as absurd a thing as to say that the Charing Cross Railway was a failure, because during the few months it had been at work it had not produced enough money to pay the cost of construction. The only loss on that gun factory had been £5,664. But what were the conditions under which it started? His hon. Friend seemed to think that it was some invincible desire on the part of the Government to extend their factories which led to the establishment of this factory. But the real reason was that the 13-inch mortars when tried against Sweaborg had burst, and so also had two others; and on the 5th of September, 1855, Colonel Wilmot, a most able officer, wrote to this effect, that he was firmly convinced, in common with most officers who had considered the subject, that it was absolutely essential to the security and efficiency of the service in this most important particular, that England, following the example of other nations, great and small, should have a foundry for iron ordnance on such a scale as might enable the Government to feel certain as to the supply of serviceable ordnance. The cost of the building, erected in consequence, was £60,707, of the machinery £37,500. The whole was afterwards applied to the Armstrong factory, which produced guns so much more cheaply than elsewhere; and the whole loss was only £5,664, although 249 guns had been cast in the factory. With regard to the clothing department, he had already admitted he should be glad to see it reduced to smaller dimensions. There were, however, certain articles the goodness of which could not be tested unless the process of manufacture was watched, and these articles ought to be manufactured by the Government. He was anxious that the House and the public should be acquainted with the true state and condition of the Government manufacturing establishments, and the cost at which the various articles were produced. Considering the interest which the subject excited in the public mind, he should look with the greatest satisfaction on the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into this subject and make a report. [Mr. COBDEN intimated his dissent.] He should like to see his hon. Friend upon the Commission. The late Sir James Graham had the same prejudices as the hon. Gentleman with regard to Woolwich. But he paid a visit to Woolwich, he looked into the matter for himself, and the result was that he changed his opinion. If his hon. Friend would only sit on a Commission he predicted that the same result would follow. It was of the highest importance to this country that the Government should have in their own hands the means of manufacturing the appliances of war. He had in this matter felt his way step by step. He began when he was in office by establishing a small foundry, and then when he was satisfied with the results he went on to a larger one. He believed that the Woolwich factory was not only a source of strength to this country, but that it had also saved the country large sums of money, and instead of discouraging by his criticism the able officers who presided over it, his hon. Friend ought rather to have given them the credit they deserved. He believed that the experiment which he (Mr. Monsell) had made had succeeded, but it would not have been a success except for the remarkable ability and zeal of the heads of departments at Woolwich.

MR. ALDERMAN ROSE said, he could not agree with the hon. Member for Rochdale—he thought it would be extremely bad policy for the Government to throw itself unreservedly into the hands of contractors. In the matter of guns the Government had of late years become their own manufacturers, and by that means we had obtained what was for the time the best weapon in the world. He was intimately acquainted with the commander of the Buffs in China, and that officer had told him that a number of Frenchmen had at one time got into a position of considerable difficulty, that he had offered to dislodge the enemy, that the French officers had treated that as an impossibility in consequence of the distance which separated the two forces, but that he had brought the Armstrong gun into play, and to the astonishment of our gallant Allies had completely succeeded in that object. When the Crimean war broke out there were miles of Low Moor iron guns in store at Woolwich. That gun, however, was found so defective and unsuited to the wants of modern science that the Armstrong gun was produced. The latter gun was so great an improvement that the Government did quite right to purchase the patent, and to manufacture it for themselves. He (Mr. Alderman Rose) thought that great advantages had accrued to this country by the manufacture of the Enfield rifle in the Government factories. The hon. Member for Rochdale said the small arms ought to be manufactured at Birmingham, where a musket used to go through twelve different hands. But there was a great advantage in completing all the parts of the process under the same roof, and to have the manufacture under control, so that the Government might produce any number they required. He thought that the amount saved by the Enfield factory had not been fairly and candidly represented by the hon. Member. Then it was said that the Government ought to depend upon private dockyards for building the ships they wanted. They did depend upon private yards for the gunboats required during the Russian war. He believed that the Admiralty required impossible conditions from the private builders. He was credibly informed that when they were applied to to send in contracts for the gunboats they frankly replied that the timber specified in the conditions did not exist—that it must be got through Russia. They were nevertheless told to send in their contracts, and to do the best they could, and the authorities would “carry them through.” He believed the officers had not the candour to explain these circumstances when complaints were made that the gunboats were built of unseasoned timber, and not otherwise according to contract. It was extremely desirable that we should not be wholly dependent on private contractors; and we were manifestly in an improved position when we could ascertain by practical experience the cost of every article we required. The result of the Crimean war was to produce a strong opinion in the minds of some people, and apparently in that of the hon. Member for Rochdale among others, that war could be carried on by contract. In his opinion that was altogether an erroneous idea, because in war you had not the conditions which existed in time of peace. A Government to carry on war with effect ought to be self-supporting, self-sustaining, and self-reliant. As a means of checking and controlling expenditure, the contract system was of great value, but it was not desirable that the Government should become entirely buyers instead of manufacturers.

Mr. WHITE said, he believed the lucid and admirable speech of the hon. Member for Rochdale would sink deep into the minds of the people, and by its delivery he had added to the debt of gratitude which the country already owed him. His hon. Friend had confined himself principally to the economical view of the question. He (Mr. White) should address himself to its moral and political view. He gave his most unqualified adhesion to the principles which his hon. Friend had laid down as to unrestricted competition. He regarded the existence of manufacturing establishments of such magnitude as those which the Government now possessed as a positive anachronism, and a contradiction of those principles of unrestricted competition of which we were supposed to be the great representatives throughout the world. Great as was the wastefulness of this system, it was but trifling compared with the political and moral evils resulting from it. Our bureaucratic system created an accumulation of discontented officials—for where could you find an official who was not discontented? That House was continually pestered, vexed, and besieged by the petitions of Government officials. Make a man a Government servant and you made him a discontented man for the rest of his life; and yet these places were such objects of ambition that people were always to be found struggling for what they thought the euthanasia of a Government employment. It was the duty of honest statesmanship to eradicate this growing bad principle from the minds of the people. In the year 1780 Mr. Dunning moved his memorable Resolution as to the growing influence of the Crown; but since then the public establishments and the number of Government servants had greatly increased. He was old-fashioned enough to look with great distrust and jealousy upon any augmentation of the power of the Executive by the multiplication of offices and the increase of their patronage. In the year 1822 the number of employés in the Civil Service was 18,500; in 1862 it was 43,163. During the 40 years which elapsed between those dates, the population of the country had increased at the rate of only 40 per cent, while the increase in the number of civil servants had been at the rate of 120 per cent. During the last 10 years the population increased 10 per cent and the civil servants 20 per cent. When we looked at the increase in connection with our army and navy, and the number of Englishmen employed in the public service in India, it would be found that we had at the present time 130,000 men more engaged under Government than we had ten years ago. Now, all undue increase of the power of the Executive was attended by a proportionate diminution of the legitimate influence of the people. Our ancestors could use scarcely any term implying greater reproach to a man holding any office or situation under the Government than to call him a "placeman." Lord Brougham, he might add, remarked in a debate which took place in 1822, that he spoke the language of the Constitution when he asserted that placemen were objects of distrust; and yet the manufacturing system, which was the subject of the present discussion, produced those placemen in the largest possible degree. He, for one, was of opinion that no man would venture to say that the public money was judiciously employed or frugally expended as matters now stood, and he maintained that it was the duty of the Government to limit as far as possible the tendency to keep up overgrown establishments. He hoped that next Session some such system as that suggested by the hon. Member for Rochdale would be adopted, with the object of repressing this growing evil.

MR. CORRY wished to make a few remarks on the subject before the House, in consequence of the observations which had fallen from the hon. Member for Rochdale with reference to the course taken by the Government of Lord Derby in the construction of wooden ships of the line and frigates. The House should bear in mind the state of the question as regarded iron-plated ships at that time. When the Government of Lord Derby succeeded to office not a single armour-plated ship had ever been tried. A vessel of that description—La Gloire—was being built in France, but she was the only one at the time even in contemplation. It was true that some iron floating batteries had been constructed during the Crimean war, and we followed the example, and sent two of these vessels to the Black Sea. Their performances, however, were unsatisfactory. So far, therefore, as practical experience went, the Government of Lord Derby had then no encouragement to embark in the construction of armour-plated ships. Under the circumstances it would, indeed, have been nothing short of insanity to enter upon their wholesale construction. At that time it would have been a jump in the dark. The Government of Lord Derby did that which was a good deal wiser—they built the Warrior, and thus made a very successful experiment; and after that the present Government built the Black Prince, the construction of which had been ordered by the Derby Government. It might be said that, as matters stood, they ought to have stayed their hands and done nothing. But what, he would ask, was the state of our navy at that time? About the period to which he was referring, a very remarkable paper appeared in the columns of The Times, extracted from an encyclopædia which was published at Leipsic, in which the writer, a German, spoke in terms of regret of the decline of the English navy, observing that France, with her enormous military power, was actually superior to us on the sea. And that was the fact. When Lord Derby's Government came into office in 1858 it was stated before a Committee called the "Treasury Committee," that France was equal to us in screw line-of-battle ships and was superior to us in frigates. Now that, it was felt, was not a safe or a satisfactory state of things for this country—for the hon. Member for Rochdale himself admits that our navy should always be superior to that of France—particularly when the aspect of our foreign relations was borne in mind; for it was the period at which the French colonels were beseeching their Emperor to allow them to appear at the Bar of the House of Commons and dictate the course of legislation which it should adopt. The Government of Lord Derby would in such a position of affairs be, in his opinion, most culpable if they had not done something, and they accordingly, by a complete and economical process of conversion, obtained a considerable force of line-of-battle ships and frigates. By that means they restored England to her proper place as a naval Power. The engines supplied to the ships then converted were of so admirable a description that when they became obsolete the engines would be available for armour-plated vessels. He should be glad if all our ships were armour-plated; but if now, unfortunately, we should be engaged in a war with France, we had not a single wooden line-of-battle ship which we should not be obliged to send to sea, for it was impossible that we could with our armour-plated ships defend our commerce, and we must, therefore, use the former until they were replaced by the latter. As to the question of building vessels in our dockyards or by contract, he perfectly admitted that the case was one in which the introduction of iron made a very material alteration. Formerly, in the case of wooden ships, the worst thing that could be done was to build them by contract; but it was a question whether iron ships could not be built as well and cheaper by contract. Many years ago, when he held office under the late Sir Robert Peel, he found that the cost of a line-of-battle ship built in the dockyards, the average age of each vessel being taken at 25 years, was £70,000 for building, and £40,000 for repairs in 25 years; whereas the contract vessels cost £55,000 for building and £59,000 for repairs in 12 instead of 25 years; so that the latter cost £114,000 in 12 years, while the former cost only £110,000 for more than twice that time. He must also express his belief that the work done in the dockyards was, as a general rule, better executed than that done by contract, and therefore contract-built ships were not necessarily cheaper than dockyard ships. He hoped, however, to see the contract system with regard to iron ships extended. With regard to our naval guns, he must say that the Admiralty did not appear to be fortunate in that respect, and he trusted they would during the recess give their earnest attention to ascertaining the best mode of arming our ships of war. He agreed with the hon. and gallant Member for Wakefield (Sir John Hay), that the kind of gun required was a 12½-ton gun, which would fire either round shot or the rifled elongated shot.

MR. CHILDERS said, he thought the House was much indebted to the hon. Member for Rochdale for the clearness with which he had brought his views on this subject before the House. For himself, having been barely three months in office, it would be presumptuous in him to give a decided opinion either one way or the other on so important and interesting a question, and his only object in rising was to submit a few facts and considerations to the House by way of suggestion to guide them in their decision on it. In regard to the manufacturing establishments in the dockyards, the hon. Member for Rochdale seemed to lay down the principle that we ought to repair and not to manufacture—that we ought to do with regard to the hulls of our ships what since the Committee of 1848 had been the rule with marine engines—purchase them new from private makers, and only repair them. Before coming to a conclusion on that point it would be well to see what actually was purchased from the private trade and what was manufactured in the dockyards. As a rule our ships were manufactured in the dockyards, and the Government put on board of them all articles necessary for their equipment; but in coming to look more nearly into the matter and considering what articles were manufactured in the dockyards and what purchased, it would be seen that there was a great distinction to be drawn which made the matter not quite so simple as the hon. Member had represented it. Our wooden ships, with very few exceptions, had all been built in the dockyards; but coming to the present state of things, when we were building armour-ships, it would be seen that there was a great limitation to building in the dockyards. Beginning with the Warrior, there were now either built or building twenty-five armour-ships, of which twelve were iron and thirteen were wooden snips plated. Out of twelve iron ships ten had been constructed in private yards, and only two in the Government dockyards. The wooden ships, plated with armour, had been built in the dockyards; but nearly all of them were originally wooden line-of-battle ships which had been converted. In the Government dockyards we manufactured wooden masts, sails, ropes, boats, copper sheathing, capstans, mixed metal articles, bolts, lead pipes, a few boilers for engines, and a few propellers. For the iron ships, on the other hand, the whole of the armour-plates were purchased from the private trade. Iron masts, iron beams, wire rigging, large pieces almost exclusively, anchors, chain cables, all heavy forgings, and all engines and boilers for new ships were manufactured by the private trade. So that at present with regard to a large part of the fittings of these ships they were purchased from the private trade. What had led to this diversity of practice? The hon. Member for Rochdale laid it down as a sort of canon that nothing which could be bought in an open competitive market should be manufactured in the dockyards. But the soundness of the rule was open to great doubt; and he did not think that any such general rule could be laid down decisively. The Government might have several firms willing to supply them with the articles they required; but, on the other hand, if the Government was the only purchaser of those articles, would they be quite sure of getting fair play, and would they derive all the advantages of competition? There was also another consideration. The lives of the crews, and even, it might be, the vital interests of the country might, under certain circumstances, depend on the efficiency of the component parts of one of Her Majesty's ships, and in view of such a contingency the mere consideration of expense sank into nothing. Therefore to the hon. Gentleman's rule must be added these exceptions—that the Government should not be the only purchaser of the articles, and their quality must be such as to stand some test which would not destroy them. The further exception must be made, that we ought to manufacture such articles as could not readily be supplied in time of war. The question of comparative cost was, no doubt, important; but with respect to the manufacture of the hulls of armoured ships there did not exist up to the present time fair means of comparison. There were now five iron ships afloat armour-clad on the principle of the Warrior and the Black Prince, all of which had been purchased from private yards; and the only ship of the kind which the Government was building, the Achilles, was not yet finished. There was not, therefore, as yet a sufficient basis on which to calculate the relative cost. Respecting the wooden ships, iron-plated, no fair comparison could be instituted. The nearest approach to a comparison possible to be made was between the iron-armoured ship the Hector, built in a private yard, and the wooden converted ships, the Royal Oak and Prince Consort. The Hector, of 4,089 tons, cost £286,718; the Royal Oak, 4,056 tons, and the Prince Consort, 4,045 tons, cost respectively £259,658, and £249,064. But there could be no conclusive comparisons until they had ships in the same condition built in the Government and in the private yards. There was another serious question, and that was as regards the time occupied in construction, and, as far as that went, the evidence was in favour of the Government dockyards. Of the iron ships at present incomplete, the Valiant was to have been completed in March, 1863, but she was not yet finished. The Prince Albert was to have been completed in June, 1863, but she was not yet delivered. The Minotaur and Agincourt were also incomplete at the appointed time. He did not mean to say that the contractors were to blame for the delay, and it might be turned to account by enabling us to take advantage of the latest improvements. He wished to call the attention of the House to the experience that might be derived elsewhere. There was no country like England for the ample supply of iron, for cheapness of labour, and for other circumstances facilitating the construction of ships; but, at the same time, it must be admitted that the United States with respect to wooden vessels were ahead of this country, and before the year the English commercial marine was being gradually driven out of the field by the effective competition of American ships. Consequently, American experience could not altogether be set aside in respect to the building of ships in public and in private yards. The following were extracts from a Report of the Secretary to the Navy in the United States, dated December, 1863:—

“In order that we may have at our command a navy which shall fulfil these unexampled and exacting conditions of efficiency, a commensurate public establishment for its construction and preparation is indispensable. A navy yard on a large scale, and in many respects of a new plan, amply furnished with all the proper facilities and aids for its operations, where machinery for steamers can be manufactured, iron vessels constructed, iron armature made and tested, and repairs of every description executed, is an absolute necessity. In view of these facts I had the honour on successive occasions to urge this matter upon the attention of the last Congress, and the omission of that body to take even the preliminary measures towards the procurement and formation of such an establishment is a misfortune which the country is now made to feel. The limited facilities for manufacturing and repairing steam machinery at the public navy yards render them totally inadequate to meet a moiety of the demands upon them. Even with the aid of private establishments, no inconsiderable portion of our naval force is waiting, unemployed, and detained from active service to the injury of the country. Proposals were issued for an iron-clad ship of the largest class (under the authority contained in the Appropriation Bills), but the cost, as shown by the propositions received for a ship of the necessary magnitude, was so great that it was deemed advisable to enter into no contract involving so large an expenditure, except by the express sanction of Congress. There are no parties in this country fully prepared to build iron vessels of the magnitude and description proposed, and the present high prices of material and labour unavoidably enhanced the cost. The Government itself is unprepared to execute any such work, having no suitable yard and establishment, and is consequently wholly in the hands of private parties to demand what they think proper, and prescribe their own terms. On former and repeated occasions, and elsewhere in this Report, the Department has fully expressed its opinion of this policy, and the necessity why the Government should be prepared to build iron vessels and the necessary machinery of the largest class. Prompt and judicious action by the legislative branch of the Government upon this subject is, in my judgment, urgently needed, and will, when it shall have been had, be carried into effect by this Department with all possible activity."

Then came another Report from the Secretary to the American Navy, dated May, 1864, which was even stronger than that to which he had just referred. That functionary stated—

"I subjoin a schedule of iron-clad gunboats of light draught in the process of construction, which, in anticipation of the state of things which now exists, were designed for service in the sounds and rivers of North Carolina, and the shallow interior waters elsewhere on the coast. These boats were contracted for as soon as it was possible to do so after the necessary appropriations for their construction were made by Congress, and it will be seen by the data given that most of them were to have been completed last year—some of them as early as September. Not one has yet been delivered, and it will be some weeks before one can be made available for service. I have felt it my duty on repeated occasions to call the attention of Congress to the necessities for a yard and establishment where iron and armoured vessels could be constructed for the Government, but the preliminary steps for such an establishment have not yet been taken. In the meantime, the Department and the Government are wholly dependent on contractors, who, if they have the will, do not possess the ability, to furnish these vessels promptly. Conflicting local controversies in regard to the place which shall be selected and benefited by the proposed important national establishment for an iron navy, such as the present and future necessities of the Government require, have contributed to delay action on this important subject. Having in view economy as well as the public necessities, I have at no time recommended that the number of our navy-yards should be increased on the Atlantic coast, but it is my deliberate opinion that no time should be wasted in establishing at a proper place a suitable yard where iron ships can be made and repaired. We feel its necessity in the emergency which has called forth the present inquiry, and not a single contractor is able to meet his engagements, even for one of this class of small vessels. In the event of a foreign war with one or more of the principal maritime Powers our condition would be most unfortunate, with no Government establishment for the construction or repair of armoured vessels such as modern science and skill are introducing. The omission to make provision for such an establishment, on which the Government can always rely, is to be regretted. Had we such an establishment at this time, I should not have been compelled to make this exhibit of a want of light-draught armour-boats for such an exigency as that which now exists in the waters of North Carolina, nor is it probable that the exigency would have occurred."

He thought that those extracts pointed to this conclusion—that in America the application of the principle embodied in the Resolution of the hon. Member for Rochdale as sound for this country had proved to be unsound as applied to that country. With respect to France, the orders given to private yards had unquestionably placed the French Government in considerable difficulty, for they were suffering from the imperfect delivery of ships. He did not wish at the present time to carry this question further; but as far as the experience of other nations was concerned, it did not point in the direction of the Resolution before the House. It did not, however, follow, that because such a course of proceeding did not suit the Americans, it would not suit this country; but he did not believe that the experience of large establishments even in this country pointed to the conclusion, that those who required a very large plant must in no case be manufacturers of that plant. In the railway world it had been found expedient for companies to undertake not only the repair but the manufacture of a considerable part of their plant. The largest Company of all, the London and North Western, manufactured their entire plant, and with perfect success. With regard to the accounts generally, he did not understand the hon. Gentleman to express any distinct disapprobation of the system. His remarks related solely to the manufacturing accounts of the War Office, for which his noble Friend the Under Secretary was ready to answer fully. As a very great improvement had recently been made in the accounts of the Admiralty it would be a pity to introduce another change until the new plan had had a fair trial. The principle which the hon. Member laid down was that before arriving at a correct statement of the cost of an article an allowance should be made for the interest on capital, depreciation of plant, and other charges which would fall on a private contractor. That was true; but the primary object of the Admiralty accounts was to exhibit the result of the cash transactions, and the introduction of these uncertain elements suggested by the hon. Member would tend to diminish their usefulness in this respect. He proposed however, during the recess, to see whether they could not, on the first day of the next financial year, take stock of their plant in the factories and manufacturing establishments; and attach to subsequent accounts statements embodying the allowances for interest on capital, wear and tear, and so on the footing of ordinary mercantile accounts. To the cost as exhibited in the rate book could then be added the increase attributable to interest, depreciation of plant, and other expenses. The House would thus be put in possession both of the cash accounts and of manufacturing accounts, based on strict commercial principles. More than this he was not now prepared to undertake, but he need hardly say that his inclination was to put the business accounts of the transactions on the Admiralty on the same footing as other business, so far as it could be done without producing fallacious impressions.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he had never hesitated to express his opinion of the impropriety of carrying the Government manufacturing establishments to their present extent. At the same time he thought that they should be maintained to such an extent that the Government would not be altogether dependent upon private enterprise when any emergency should occur. The whole weight of the argument seemed to be to him on the side of the hon. Member for Rochdale. His hon. Friend had instituted a comparison between the cost of constructing ships in the Government yards and by private contract, and nobody could say that he had overstated his case; and he had also shown that the present system of keeping the accounts was a perfect absurdity. What, then, must the case have been when there was hardly any reckoning at all. His hon. Colleague (Mr. Monsell) had given as a reason for not depending altogether on private manufacturers, that when shells were wanted during the Crimean war the contractors took advantage of the necessity of the occasion by increasing largely their price; but that was not the fault of the contractors—it was the natural consequence of the principle of supply and demand. If a war were to break out to-morrow the Government would be compelled to increase the wages of even their own dockyard labourers, as well as to pay an increased price for the materials. The hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), in his defence of the Admiralty, quoted the Report of the Secretary of the United States Navy in support of his views; but it should be recollected that it was the interest of all Government officials to favour their own institutions—and, moreover, the circumstances of the United States were peculiar owing to the suddenness of the emergency, so that he (Colonel Dickson) thought that that part of the hon. Gentleman's arguments fell to the ground. Turning to the clothing establishment at Pimlico, to which he had devoted considerable attention, he found that it had increased to a greater extent than could be readily conceived. Between the years 1858-9 and 1862-3 there had been spent in repairs and buildings £51,892, and for machinery £4,859. The amount paid as wages for labour in that establishment was upwards of £44,000, and for superintendence the charge was £15,000, or nearly 35 per cent. At the clothing establishment at Woolwich exactly the same rate of increase was going on. It might be said by the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) that the army was better clothed now than before these establishments were set up. Well, nothing could be worse than the clothing was previously; but they must not attribute the improvement of the article to these establishments. They must attribute it to the fact that the eyes of the country were opened by the Crimean war, and that the public began to care for that army of whose existence they seemed before almost entirely ignorant, or, at all events, to care but little. Then the noble Lord said that the clothing was cheaper. But that was owing to the decreased price of cloth. When the red drummers' cloth was first introduced into the army its cost was over 9s. per yard; but, according to the last contract, the price was only 6s. 6d., so that the diminution of cost must be attributed to the enterprise of the manufacturers. He gave the officers who conducted these establishments credit for zeal and a desire to render them efficient; but they could not expect matters to be carried on on strictly mercantile principles when they were directed by officers who had no mercantile experience. He maintained that the system would be much better carried on if they trusted in a great measure to private contract. On a former occasion he was assured by the late lamented Sir George Lewis, that it was not intended thus to swallow up all the army clothing in these establishments, and that it was intended to give out the trousers to private contract; but, up to this time, the only articles not manufactured there were the tunics for fifty battalions. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Corry) said that ships could be better built in the public dockyards than in the private yards; but his own opinion was that some of the finest ships they had seen had come out of private yards; and he instanced the Himalaya. He thought these Government manufacturing establishments were carried on to an absurd extent—that they ought to have far greater recourse to private enterprize — that the system of accounts particularly required revision, and that the enormous waste and extravagance which had taken place lately was highly culpable and reflected very much upon themselves. He would support the Motion of the hon. Member for Rochdale.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I shall detain the House for only a short time; but I feel bound to make a few observations in consequence of the hon. Member who brought forward the subject having alluded to me somewhat personally in connection with the question. It seems to me that the hon. Member has selected a rather extraordinary period for bringing this subject under the notice of the House. He has had on the paper for a long time the notice of his intention to call the attention of the House to the great extension of our manufacturing departments. I think his notice points to "recent" great extension in these departments; but I believe that, on reference to the Estimates and accounts for the last ten years, it will appear that this year we have spent less for buildings and machinery, or any extension of these establishments, than in any other year of that period. The hon. Member sat still while the Government were largely increasing their buildings and machinery, and it is only when they have reached a limit which it is not contemplated by any one to extend, he calls attention to the fact that our manufacturing departments have extended. What the hon. Member proposes to do I can scarcely discover. In order to make a prima facie case he was obliged to fall back on the assertion that the Government were not only bad manufacturers, but had been driven to manufacture because they were such bad buyers. I cannot but think he did not support that assertion by any distinct proof. He brought forward two cases, one of them that of small arms; but he did not at all enter into the question whether the inability of the Government to buy on favourable terms was owing to an inherent defect in their arrangements, or to the fact that there must always be great difficulties in the way of Government purchasing on good terms which do not exist in the case of purchases by private individuals or private companies. It is the disposition of contractors—and I do not mean to say they are worse than other people—to supply articles cheap rather than good; and I do not see how it is possible to guard the interests of the public, and the lives of our soldiers and sailors, which may very often depend upon the excellence of the articles supplied to them, except by a minute and rigid inspection of the articles contracted for. It is to that close and rigid inspection, I believe, the contractors object. At the conclusion of the war it was alleged that the contractors were harassed and vexed by needless requirements on the part of the heads of departments; that, owing to their ignorance of business and their want of commercial habits, they worried the contractors by all sorts of needless objections. As far as the Government could, they removed that source of complaint. They did what the hon. Member seems to suggest. They secured the services of a gentleman known for the integrity of his character, and also for acquaintance with commercial matters; and I can assure the House the system which prevails in the departments is not an old one, but a new one. There is now an Inspector of Contracts, whose duty it is to see that the contractors are dealt with in a commercial manner, and not harassed by a vexatious and too stringent inspection. It is possible that still further improvement may be made in that direction; but still I say that I cannot see how the interests of the public are to be protected without a minute and stringent examination of the articles supplied by contract. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell) answered very satisfactorily all that part of the statement of the hon. Member for Rochdale which referred to the great extension of our laboratory during the time of war. It is all very well for hon. Members to say, that during the last few years the manufacturing resources of the country generally have so extended that private manufacturers must be capable of supplying the Government with whatever they may require; but there are facts to prove the reverse. At the time the war in the Crimea was going on there was hardly a sufficiency of warlike stores in the arsenals, and the Government called for contracts for all the warlike materials they wanted, totally regardless of price. They were perfectly willing to pay any price the contractors might demand; yet those stores which were absolutely required could not be got. The hon. Gentleman referred to shells which he said had never been fired. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick has shown that to be a mistake; but supposing it were not, what would it prove?

Colonel Dickson

The war might have continued and extended; and if that had happened, would it not have been a matter of the last importance to have our army well supplied with ammunition? As to the extension of the laboratory at Woolwich, without now going into the cost of it, I must say that was a work of absolute and positive necessity. It was a matter of absolute necessity to erect these buildings and purchase that machinery, because the articles were wanted and could not be got in any other manner. The right hon. Member for Limerick has, I think, successfully defended the establishment of the gun factory at Woolwich. A good deal has been said with respect to the Armstrong guns; but I cannot see how the mere fact of possessing a Government manufactory renders us answerable for any failure in those guns. The hon. Member for Rochdale says the proper course would have been to invite Sir William Armstrong, Mr. Whitworth, Captain Blakeley, and other inventors, to make guns and supply them to the Government; but if that had been done the Government must have been prepared to take any description of guns which might have been sent in. The hon. Member admits that he is not acquainted with military affairs; but he must be aware that it is essential that the armament of the country should be of a uniform description, and not an armament consisting partly of Armstrong guns, partly of Whitworth guns, partly of Westley Richards' guns, and partly of Captain Blakeley's. The hon. Member seems to think that the Armstrong guns have proved a failure; but if that was the case, which I do not at all admit, it would not be the system of having manufacturing departments that would be answerable for it. The hon. Gentleman says it was a great mistake to subsidize the Elswick Works, and he pointed to the fact that Sir William Armstrong, who had been connected with those works, became the superintendent of the factory. I am not here to say whether that was a good arrangement or not; but, again, it has nothing to do with the system of having manufacturing departments. Of course it was competent for the Government, having decided that they would adopt the Armstrong gun, to ask for tenders for making it; but the hon. Member is mistaken if he supposes that tenders in such a case would have come in in any number. What was the case with regard to the old cast-iron guns? In the face of open competition there were only two, or at the most three, manufacturers who ever supplied cast-iron guns to the Government at all. That was not on account of the prejudices of the Government, but simply because only two or three firms thought it worth while to go to the necessary expense of obtaining the right sort of iron. In the case of the Elswick Company we must either have guaranteed the repayment of a certain portion of the expenditure in plant, or we must have ordered from the Company such a supply of guns as would have repaid them for their first outlay. It is not unimportant that from the first day that the manufacture of the Armstrong gun was commenced, Sir William Armstrong and others engaged in the manufacture have been constantly improving it; but if we had entered into a large contract we should have been obliged either to content ourselves with guns according to the first sample, or to pay the Company an enormous sum in the shape of compensation. I will not enter at any length into the case of the Enfield Factory, but I have referred to the debates [see v. 144] which took place at the time that factory was established, and I find that the only persons who objected to it were the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) and the late hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. G. F. Muntz). Of course the reasons which induced those Gentlemen to oppose the erection of the Enfield Factory are obvious. The hon. Member for Rochdale says, the reason we did not get rifles as rapidly from Birmingham as we wanted was that the Government had such an absurd way of contracting for them. He says they contracted for each portion of the arm separately, and that great delay arose in putting them together. But that was not a system invented by the Government; on the contrary, it is the system in use in Birmingham now, and in every other place where firearms are manufactured. Indeed, it is absolutely necessary, if the Government is to exercise an efficient inspection over the rifles supplied to the troops, that that inspection should be made before the rifle is finished, and should take place in every stage of the construction of the weapon. The Birmingham trade was asked to supply rifles; but it did not supply anything like the number required, and papers which have been laid upon the table will show how very far short of those promises the performances of the trade were. It is sometimes said that the Government are behind the trade in introducing improvements into machinery ; but it was the Government and not the trade who brought over the improvements from America. The Government, having determined to establish a factory, sent over inspectors to America, who brought back the machinery, and this having been put up at Enfield, was soon copied by the trade at London and Birmingham. There is one establishment which has found no friend in the course of this debate, and that was the clothing factory at Pimlico. The hon. Gentleman who last spoke seems to have taken all the expenses of that establishment, and put them down as the expenses incurred in working the factory. That is not so, as a great part of the expenses is not incurred for the factory, but for the establishment at Pimlico for the inspection and storing of clothing. When we gave up the system of clothing the army through the agency of the colonels of regiments, it became necessary that we should obtain a supply by contract or else manufacture ourselves. If we get them by contract we must have some place to store them in, and some efficient establishment in which they could be inspected, and a large portion of the expenses set down for the Pimlico factory is chargeable to the Pimlico clothing establishment as a whole. It has been said that the price of clothing has been reduced since the establishment of the factory. That is quite true ; and it is erroneous to attribute that to the decrease in the price of cloth. In 1859 there were three contractors who made infantry tunics, and the average price was £1 0s. 8d. the price of cloth being 7s. 10d. a yard. In 1862 the price of a tunic was 16s. 6d., the price of cloth being 7s. per yard. Therefore, allowing for the diminution in the price of cloth the contractor's price was 3s. less in 1862 than in 1859. The Pimlico factory was not established without a full inquiry and due deliberation. With regard to the Woolwich factory, I may remind the House that the Commission appointed to inquire into the system of contracts and of providing stores for the army, reported, in reference to Woolwich, that the establishment was well adapted for clothing the soldiers well, expeditiously, and economically ; but they gave no opinion whether it was cheaper or not. That experiment was so far satisfactory that I am not surprised it was extended and the factory at Pimlico established. I do not say that an equal necessity exists for the Government manufacturing army clothing as for its manufacturing war materials. It is not likely that such an extension of the supply will be required in the case of clothing as in the case of war materials ; but I nevertheless believe that the system now pursued of manufacturing part and allowing the remainder to be provided by contract is the best which can be adopted. At Pimlico clothing is made for forty battalions of the line, and shell jackets and trousers for the rest. The contractors still make the clothing of fifty-three battalions, besides all the clothing for the Post Office officials, for the Metropolitan Police, and others, which, however, is passed through the army establishment to be inspected. There is only one contractor for the clothing still existing, and I believe he is a constituent of the right hon. Member for Limerick. He has succeeded in driving every other contractor out of the field, and it seems to me that if we were to relinquish our manufactory we should be left entirely in the power of this one contractor, or one or two others. The balance-sheet with my name attached to it, to which the hon. Member has referred, was not prepared with the view of making an accurate comparison between the prices of articles made by the Government and the price of those supplied by contract. The object of that balance-sheet, on which much time and trouble have been bestowed, is to give the House, as well as we can, an accurate account of what the work done at the establishment was, and it certainly was not designed in the first instance for the purpose of comparison with the articles made by contract. The form of account which the hon. Member wishes us to render would, I think, be purely fictitious, and, if adopted, I feel sure that he would be the first to accuse us of something like cooking accounts. He desires that we should make a charge against our establishments for rates and taxes. We do not pay rates and taxes, and therefore the charge for them would be merely imaginary. The hon. Member also wants us to fix a charge for the value of the land. But the land at Woolwich when bought by the Government was almost valueless, and its present value is very much to be attributed to the works we have erected upon it. What the accounts therefore aim at showing, and do show, is the actual expenses incurred ; they show accurately and fairly what the cost to the country of an article is when once we have erected the buildings and bought the machinery. We give the House all the information we are able to give. We state what sum has been expended in past years upon buildings and machinery. Hon. Members can draw their own deductions from the accounts and put such a further percentage on the price of the articles we manufacture as they may think proper, but I do not see how we could present the account truthfully in a different form. The hon. Member took great exception to the Enfield balance-sheet with respect to the price which certain articles would have cost if obtained from the trade. Now, great pressure has been placed upon the Government during the last year or two from the gun trade for extensive orders to be given to them; yet surely when we have got the Enfield manufactory, and the House has voted the money for the buildings and plant, it becomes the duty of the Government to see in what way by the outlay of the money they can get at the cheapest rate the articles they require. And I say that the account presented by Colonel Dickson gives an accurate comparison for the purpose for which it was intended. That officer says that if you give him so much money he will produce so many rifles, and that if the same quantity had been supplied by the trade it would have cost so much more, including the expense of proving. The saving between the two sums stated appears to me to be the actual saving to the country, now that it has gone to the expense of erecting factories and purchasing machinery. It is quite another question whether it was economical to establish the factories in the first instance; but for the purpose for which the account is placed before the House it is perfectly correct. There was a great deal of discussion before the Ordnance Committee last year as to the system of accounts. I cannot pretend to speak with authority as to whether the system now pursued is the best that could be adopted; but I will say that no one is more anxious than the War Department is to have the accounts kept in as sound and accurate a form as possible, and to have them so laid before the House. The hon. Gentleman says he has no faith in appointing Select Committees on this matter; but surely on a point like this, which does not involve a principle, but only the simplest and most known commercial axioms, some practical men of business might with advantage inquire into the system on which these accounts are kept, and might present a report that would be useful to the House as indicating whether these accounts are to be trusted or not. Every one connected with the establishments, and all the accountants who have been sent to Woolwich to investigate the system, give their opinion that the system is correct. Would it not, therefore, be better for the hon. Member to institute inquiry by commercial and practical men, rather than upon his own mere authority to say the accounts are not worth anything whatever? I am glad, Sir, that this question has been brought forward, because it has given rise to a most interesting and useful discussion. I think that the long and painful investigations which have preceded the speech of the hon. Member for Rochdale have not been of more value to any other Gentleman in this House than to the hon. Member himself. I recollect an occasion when the hon. Gentleman spoke in very sweeping terms indeed of the waste and extravagance with which all the Government manufactories were conducted, and when he said that any practical man would tell you that at least one-half the money spent upon them was wasted. He has confessed, at least, in the case of the factory at Enfield, that he believes it has been worked at a profit; and I do not think that in any other case he has proved or attempted to prove the assertion which he then made, that at least one-half the money expended in these factories is wasted. If the money is so wasted it must be by the mismanagement of the factories, and he has not pointed out the mismanagement. The Government factories have the advantage of working upon a large scale; they have the advantage of a constant demand; they have not to make a contractors' profit; and, if they do not, they ought to produce the cheaper of the two. I believe they do supply us at a cheaper rate than the contractors. At all events, I do not think anything has been said to-night which proves that they do not do so. And instead of such a Resolution as all must have anticipated from the hon. Member—namely, one of sweeping condemnation against all the Government factories, the hon. Gentleman has contented himself with laying on the table a Motion which, if it had been made, would only have amounted to a recommendation for the adoption of a somewhat modified system of accounts.

MR. CHILDERS explained that what he had said was that in laying down a rule as to purchasing or manufacturing, one element for consideration was whether the Government was the only customer.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he should content himself with referring to that portion of the Resolution of the hon. Member for Rochdale, on which the hon. Member had himself more lightly touched. The right hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Monnell) had stated that the charge for shells and other missiles at the breaking out of the Crimean war entirely justified the erection of the extensive works at Woolwich. What were really the facts? That the orders so suddenly given to the contractors in that emergency compelled them to go to largely increased expense. Taking, for instance, the Low Moor Company, he could prove that in order to execute the commissions for the Government the Company had to erect extensive buildings, and when the Government orders ceased those buildings became useless, and actually the land and buildings had been presented to the town, and baths and washhouses had since been erected on the site. A sudden pressure of that kind, which demanded extra exertions, had a corresponding effect upon prices; but it did not justify the allegation that the new factory for shells had been a great success in an economical point of view. The noble Lord who had just spoken (the Marquess of Hartington) had put forth as a justification for Government establishments that rigid inspection was absolutely necessary. It was true that rigid inspection should be exercised over all articles of Government consumption; but that was equally true whether the articles were manufactured by Government or simply sold to them. The noble Lord had referred to the Armstrong contract as proving that the Government might sometimes be properly its own manufacturers; but the Government had ultimately paid Sir William Armstrong £65,000 to be quit of their engagement, while Sir William Armstrong was set free to make guns for all the world. This was done after the Government had spent between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000, and he believed they would now willingly get rid of the stock they had on hand in consequence of that contract. With respect to the accounts, he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale was right, for the accounts rendered from Enfield were no accounts at all; they were a mere insult to the common sense of the House. Then, with regard to iron-plated ships, if, as had been said by his hon. Friend (Mr. Childers), five-sixths of the iron armour-plated ships had been supplied from private yards, it was hardly possible to understand the large expenditure in our dockyards during the last year or two. Then it was said that it could not be safe to rely upon private yards for ships in time of war when the Government would be the only purchaser. For himself he had no personal interest in the matter, but he was enabled to state that there was one private yard producing a larger amount of work for Foreign Governments, and for our own Government, than was turned out in all the Government dockyards, and from all the private yards in which work was done for them. Thus, the Government was not placed in the position of being the only purchaser.

MR. CHILDERS said, what he referred to was that a great consideration was that the Government was the best customer.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he accepted the explanation, but what he wished to show was, that if the Government were steady customers they would always be supplied with what they wanted at the cheapest rate, but that if they applied to the trade only in time of war, they could not be cheaply supplied. With respect to the accounts of ships, he agreed with his hon. Friend that it was very difficult to institute a comparison between them. Out of the twenty-three ships ordered by the Government, he believed eighteen were different in size and structure. But as all early efforts were mainly experimental, it would be unfair to make a rigid comparison of cost. As a test of the capabilities of the private yards, he might refer to the magnificent yacht recently built for the Sultan of Turkey by a private firm, and to her Majesty's yacht, built in a Government yard, the one being universally admired, the other universally condemned. He trusted that the House would allow him to refer to private affairs for a few moments, in order to afford information. The amount of labour and material employed in all the Government dockyards was nothing like half as much as were employed by his own firm; and the firm so kept their accounts that in reference to each contract the capital charge was taken into account, and the cost of every article used in each particular contract was known on the termination of the work, and the exact cost of every item in the contract clearly shown. Until the Government furnished similar accounts they would not fulfil their duty. What was wanted was a debtor and creditor account for each particular yard, showing what each yard cost and produced; for then they would be able to see which yard manufactured the cheapest, and whether the public would supply them better. He must say that since the noble Lord (Lord Clarence Paget) had been at the Admiralty they had had more information than they had before; but still the 600 pages of information and the labour charts were not accounts in the proper sense of the word. Nothing could deserve the name of an account which did not include the cost of depreciations, of superintendence, of lighting, &c. At present, in our seven dockyards there were 227 separate establishments. Each had its separate superintendent, its inspector, sub-inspectors, timekeepers, and all the paraphernalia of a great establishment. He was not clear whether we were not carrying the separation of various establishments too far. For instance, they were told with respect to hemp that at Chatham the manufacture of rope could be carried on more cheaply than elsewhere. If that was the case, manufacture all you wanted at Chatham. If you could do a thing more economically at one place than another, concentrate the manufacture there; and if you found you could buy more cheaply than you could manufacture, by all means go to private establishments. He wished now to call attention to the enormous increase in our establishments during the last few years. Taking the year preceding the Crimean war, he found that the expenditure on the navy in 1852 was £5,622,000, while in 1864 it was £10,432,000, showing an increase of £4,810,000, or 83 per cent. The expense of superintendence in the dockyards was £155,000 in 1852 and £230,000 in 1864, showing an increase of £75,000. In labour and wages in the dockyards the expenditure in 1852 was £702,000, and in 1864 £1,344,000—an increase of £642,000, or nearly 100 per cent. Materials and stores for shipbuilding cost £782,000 in 1852, and £1,826,000 in 1864, which was an increase of no less than £1,044,000. The Admiralty were spending now as much upon wood as they were before iron was used, and he was very much in the condition of the noble Lord before he became Secretary of the Admiralty—he could not make out what became of the money. In 1852 the number of salaried persons employed in superintending the yards was 431; in 1864 it was 522. In 1852 the number of workmen employed in the dockyards and factories was 10,757, while in 1864 there were 19,419, an increase of 8,662. Now if the Admiralty were putting out so many iron ships to be built by private contract, what were all these men about? As far as he could make out from the accounts, about 26 per cent of this labour was devoted to converting timber and to manufacturing operations in the workshops; and it was therefore of great importance that the House should be able to see from the accounts whether the Government manufactured more cheaply than they could buy. As to the smaller dockyards, it was the practice of men of business to concentrate as much as possible—the fewer their establishments the more economically they could be conducted; and in the same way, if the Admiralty had seven dockyards, when they could do all that they wanted in three or four, looking, moreover, to the enormous sums spent in protecting these establishments, it would be exceedingly desirable to sell the small dockyards. The great thing for the Government to achieve was not to go on spending money in the dark. The Admiralty had probably tried to do their best with the accounts, but they were not accounts at all in the eyes of commercial men, and he hoped that next year such accounts would be presented as commercial men would understand and appreciate.

GENERAL PEEL: If I am called upon for my opinion upon the Resolution of the hon. Member for Rochdale, I must express entire agreement with that portion of it which demands that full and satisfactory accounts should be laid annually before the House. This is only what I promised to do when I was in office, and what I fully proposed doing had I remained in office. When, however, the hon. Gentleman says that he has read attentively the evidence given before the Committee, and professes to describe what took place there, I can only say that, if he had not told us he had read the evidence attentively, I could not possibly have believed it. The description he has given of the introduction of the Armstrong gun into the service is quite contrary to the clear statement made before the Committee, and quite contrary to the explanations which I have made in this House so frequently that I am ashamed of repeating them. In 1858, when I came into office, we were the only country in the world that had not got a rifled gun. I at once appointed a Committee to report upon the best rifled gun that was to be had—I did not care whose

it was or what it was. The hon. Gentleman says the Armstrong gun was adopted because the Duke of Cambridge said this or because somebody else said that. No such thing. It was adopted because it had proved itself superior to all the other guns which were submitted to the Committee. They tried the Whitworth—they tried every gun which was before them—and they reported that the Armstrong gun was the best, limiting their approval to its use as a field gun; and I believe at the present moment that it is the best field gun in any country in the world. The hon. Gentleman said that the War Office did not know either how to build a gun or to buy one. What would be the consequence of following his advice? He says we should have tried the Whitworth, and everybody else's gun that seemed of merit. But you cannot have different guns in your service. You must make up your mind to adopt one. Then the hon. Member says, "Why did you not give Sir William Armstrong a large order for these guns?" What would have been the result of doing so? The absolute cost price of the gun which we had experimented upon was £260. If I had entered into a contract with Sir William Armstrong we should have had to pay him £260 a piece. Remember, he had a patent for his guns, and we must have dealt with him upon his own terms; we could not have gone to anybody else. Well, we did not do that. The hon. Member is wrong in saying that we paid the Elswick Company £60,000. We did not pay them one farthing. What the Company said was, "If we establish a plant for your particular service, will you pay us at the end for our outlay?" That was a fair stipulation. But instead of paying £260 for the guns we paid £170 originally, and afterwards a much smaller proportion. I wish to vindicate the Government to which I belonged in their proceedings with respect to the Armstrong gun. It is said that £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 have been spent; but all I am responsible for is the Estimate of 1858, which I brought forward. I fully approve of what my noble Friend who succeeded me in the War Office did. At that time there was no such thing as armour-plated ships. Neither armour-plated ships nor guns to pierce them were contemplated at the time. We took then the best gun that we could get, and if we had not done so what would be said except that we were behind other nations? Why, this House was always urging us on. It has been said that we are about to convert the whole of our muzzle-loading into breech-loading guns. I do not say whether that is right or not; but I do say that if we are going to do so we can effect that change much more cheaply in our own factories than anywhere else. And as for the gentlemen at the head of those manufacturing establishments, I say if they had works of their own they would earn twice as much as they receive from the Government. It is impossible to describe how efficiently they perform their duty. It has been said that a large sum has not been spent on warlike stores last year and the year before. But why has it not been spent? Because you have not yet decided what is the best rifled gun; but the instant you come to a decision on that point you will have to lay out a large sum. Again, with reference to armour-plating, you have not yet made up your minds. But let not the House deceive itself by imagining there can be any great saving effected in your warlike expenditure. And now a word about the establishment at Pimlico. The hon. Gentleman said that when I came into office it was necessary to change the system. The clothing is done partly by contract and partly by yourselves. But you must have a large establishment at Pimlico even for the clothing which is done by contract, because it is sent there in order to be inspected. I believe the clothing of the English army, which is done partly by contract and partly by our own manufacture, is better done than for any army in the world.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Before coming to the questions raised by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto), I wish to advert first to the subject of the Armstrong guns. Very strong opinions have been given to-night against Sir William Armstrong's breech-loaders. I have always been very frank on this subject, and I spoke of them as having been unsuccessful at Kagosima. But at the late affair in New Zealand these guns—both the 100-pounders and the 40-pounder—are reported by Sir William Wiseman, a high authority on this point inasmuch as he has commanded the Excellent, to have worked admirably. I was sorry not to have been in my place to-night when the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Bernal Osborne) asked whether some of our men had not been wounded in consequence of the stripping off of the lead from the projectiles? We have had no such accounts, and, as I have already said, the Report made by Sir William Wiseman is most satisfactory. The hon. Member for Finsbury finds fault with the dockyard accounts; but he has given us credit ever since the present Government has been in office, of endeavouring to make them so clear that every one would be able to form a comparison between the cost of ships built in private yards and those built in Her Majesty's dockyards. We are told that we should endeavour to put a price upon every thing. But how are we to do that? It would be a mere imaginary valuation, and I am sure if we were to attempt anything of the kind the House would not be satisfied with it. What we do is this—and I beg the attention of the House to it—the whole cost both of material and the labour expended upon it is given separately for each dockyard; so that the very accounts which my hon. Friend asks for are given already in what are called the "labour charts" of the dockyards. I quite admit that those charts might be improved, and if my hon. Friend will come to the Admiralty and make suggestions with that view I shall be very glad to profit by them. But if hon. Members suppose that because we have gone largely into iron ships we are at the present time about to give up wooden ships, that is not the intention of the Government. We are as desirous as any hon. Member to enlarge our iron fleet. No doubt such a fleet possesses great advantages, particularly in the heavy armour-plated ships; and we have done all in our power, and given every encouragement to inventors to come to us, in order to get rid of that most fatal defect—namely, the fouling of their bottoms, for until we have got rid of that we cannot have our cruisers, which go two or three years without ever entering a dock, built of iron. The time, therefore, has not come for suppressing the wooden fleet altogether. Hon. Members are all desirous that the business of the country should be conducted properly; but I can assure them that it is after the most serious consideration that the Admiralty have come to the conclusion that they should fail in their duty if they gave up the building of wooden ships. I will give an illustration which I have employed before. Everybody has heard of the feats of the Alabama. It is true she has shown her weakness. As a wooden ship against the heavy guns of the present day she could not last ten minutes. But for all that the Alabama has done to her enemies an immense amount of damage; but if she had been an iron ship she never could have done half of it. For many months she was away from any dock, yet she was able to catch a vast number of the ships of the enemy; but if she had been of iron she would long before have lost her speed from the foulness of her bottom. Merchant ships have a given duty to perform. They go from one part of the world to another and bring a return cargo home. They are consequently always moving. But the essential duty of a vessel of war is to lie at anchor at a particular spot; and that is the reason why these ships, not going through the water, get their bottoms foul. But if any person supposes because we are building these iron ships we are therefore about to reduce our dockyards, I cannot, without deceiving him, hold out a hope of any great reduction. If we are to retain wooden ships—and I have shown the necessity of retaining them—we must be continually employed in repairs, and at present we have great arrears to clear off. But, says my hon. Friend, I do not object to repairs, but to the large number of men that you keep in your yards. But any practical builder will agree with me that to get good mechanics for repairing you must make them acquainted with the art of shipbuilding. The ships are coming in at uncertain intervals for repairs, and when the workmen are not engaged in repairs they are employed in building. But, speaking generally, our dockyards are almost altogether employed in keeping our fleet in repair. I am extremely glad we have had this interesting discussion, and I do not doubt that we shall derive considerable benefit from the suggestions that have been made. But I protest against the supposition that the substitution of iron for wooden ships holds out a prospect of any considerable reduction in the expenses of our dockyards.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he agreed with almost everything that had fallen from the hon. Member for Rochdale. For the efficient defence of the country it was necessary that the interests of the mercantile community should be identified with that of the Government, so that the Government should be able in emergencies to fall back on the vast resources which it afforded. The advantage of a Government manufacturing department was simply as a check upon private contractors, but that check was eminently necessary. The Enfield manufactory was originally established during the Peninsular war, in consequence of the disgraceful frauds of the contractors, and the necessities of the Crimean war had originated there the introduction of machinery. The differences between the masters and workmen at Birmingham had hitherto prevented this great improvement in the trade, but the latter had at last followed the example of the Government, and one of the finest factories in the country had been lately built at Birmingham for the manufacture of small arms by machinery. The powder mills at Waltham Abbey had a similar origin. In 1777 the powder of the navy was so disgraceful that a Commission sent to Plymouth reported that only a few barrels were in a serviceable condition—and this in time of war. The mills at Waltham Abbey were, therefore, established; but they were never meant to be more than a check upon the contractors, and they had fully answered their purpose. The powder now supplied by contractors to Government was all that could be wished. The third manufacturing department was that for making gun carriages. An inquiry took place in 1829, when the late Lord Hardinge and the Duke of Wellington gave valuable evidence; and another inquiry took place in 1849. The result of these inquiries was that it was found absolutely necessary that gun carriages should be built under Government superintendence. It was impossible to tell by any mere test, after a gun carriage was constructed, whether it would stand the work required of it on service; yet the breaking down of a gun carriage on the march or in the field was so important as to involve sometimes the loss of an action, sometimes even of a campaign. It was, therefore, necessary that every part of a gun carriage should be made under the eye of the Government officials. The fourth department was the laboratory. The standing rule in former days with reference to these stores was to purchase of contractors, with the exception of articles not generally marketable. The establishment originally was at first small, and the whole outlay upon it did not exceed £6,000 or £7,000 a year. Then came the invention of percussion as applicable to small arms. It was found that if the Government bought percussion caps in the open market, the contractors adulterated them for the sake of making a greater profit, so that they could not be relied upon, and thenceforward they were manufactured in the laboratory. In 1847-8, improvements were made in fusees and shells, and it was found that the work required such minute accuracy that it was necessary to make them in the Government laboratory. Since the Crimean war further improvements had been made in fusees, rockets, and shells, and these were also consequently made in the laboratory. The principle having always been for the Government to enter into contracts for anything that could be bought in the open market, but to manufacture those articles for which there was no demand, and which required to be watched in the process of manufacture, it naturally followed that as the requirements in these matters increased, the work to be done in the Royal laboratory also increased. It was true also that the cost of the Government gun manufacture had increased enormously, but it was only of late years that the improvements in the art of war rendered it necessary to spend such large sums of money. When Sir William Armstrong produced his gun, there was not a manufacturer in England who could make it. Some years afterwards, Mr. Whitworth got up the Manchester Ordnance Company, and brought out a rival gun, and steel shells were now made at Sheffield; but there was still no competition in such matters to counterbalance the value of the Royal gun factory. One word in regard to the accounts of these departments, and the position of the superintendents. An artillery officer was appointed to undertake the supervision of one of these departments, just as he might be sent to take the command of a brigade. It was part of his profession, and all he had to do with the figures was to render an account to the War Office of the sums he received and the manner in which they had been expended. These officers knew nothing ex officio of the value of the plant, the amount that ought to be charged to capital, and the interest of money. Those were matters appertaining to accounts of bygone years registered at the War Office, and for the War Office to calculate.

MR. LAIRD said, that having sat for two years on the Ordnance Committee, he was surprised to hear the statement of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), because it came out before the Committee that the members of the Government were strongly of opinion that the

Woolwich accounts were not reliable. He thought the hon. Member for Rochdale was correct when he said that we could not ascertain the cost of ships built in the dockyards; and unless we could do this all comparison as to the relative expense of public and private yards was fallacious. The noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty had declared the adherence of the department to wooden ships. One great cause of expenditure was this preference on the part of the Admiralty. As he built the first iron ship for the navy, he had much pleasure in saying that she was now twenty-four years old, and was at the present moment doing good service in the African squadron. The total amount voted for dockyards in the present Estimates, exclusive of engines and contract work, was about £3,000,000. The cost of management of the dockyards was about £134,000. The Admiralty were only building at the present moment in the dockyards six iron-cased ships, at a total estimated cost complete of £1,287,000. They were only building six wooden ships, at a cost of £107,000. There was thus a total expenditure for 1864-5 of £3,000,000, and estimating the expenditure during the coming year on iron-cased and wooden ships at £1,000,000, leaves about £2,000,000 to be accounted for, and which must go in repairs, alterations, refittings, &c. It was persevering in building wooden ships after the Governments of other countries were convinced of the superiority of iron, that caused so much waste and so large an expenditure. He believed that there would be an advantage in having fast sailing vessels like the Alabama, but he would remind the House that that vessel was totally destroyed in her action with the Kearsarge by the bursting of a single shell in her side. Had she been an iron vessel a shell would have done comparatively little damage. This showed that we should suffer some terrible disaster if we sent out wooden three-deckers to engage ships armed with the powerful artillery which was now coming into use. It would be much better to spend a million of money in graving docks upon our foreign stations, so as to enable us to dock and clean the bottoms of iron vessels. He could not go the entire length his hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale did with regard to our naval establishments. He was of opinion that it was desirable to build and repair in public yards, and also to build and repair in private yards. Both in the Committee of which he was a member and elsewhere he had always advocated the extension of the dockyards at Chatham, Portsmouth, and Plymouth. In time of war we could not do without large docks at those places, and in time of peace we suffered great loss from the want of proper dock and basin accommodation there, and the consequent necessity of fitting vessels in the stream. He believed that the Achilles, the first iron ship which the Admiralty had built, had cost the country £20,000 or £30,000 more than she would have done if she could have been fitted in a dock or basin. At the same time, he agreed with the hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto) in desiring the abolition of Deptford, Woolwich, and Pembroke Dockyards, which cost the country in management £40,000 a year. On the Thames there were plenty of private graving docks in which ships might be either repaired or constructed. In the Bristol Channel, at Cardiff, or Swansea, there was also good dock accommodation, and on the Mersey there were plenty of docks for the repair of ships. No man in the country could say what would be the time required to repair iron-cased ships, if damaged in action; but, at all events, it would be cheaper to send the ships where the labour was to be had than to bring the labour to them. If in time of peace both building and repairs were done in private yards, a number of firms would be accustomed to do work as it was done in the Government dockyards, and thus the resources of the country in war time would be doubled. The same rule might be adopted in regard to this matter as was acted upon in the case of the construction of engines, and only those firms might be permitted to do the work which could in time of war give the graving dock and other accommodation which would be required by the country. He hoped that the Admiralty would seriously consider the question of disposing of the three smaller yards he had mentioned, because if the £40,000 a year which they cost was capitalized, it would go far to defray the expense of making the other and more important dockyards all that we required.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was anxious to express his thanks to the hon. Member for Rochdale for having brought forward this Motion, because it was obvious that the enormous extension of the Government establishments was gradually entailing upon the Government and the House the difficulties of monopoly. If the discussion had proved nothing else it had shown that all comparisons which the Returns laid before the House which pretended to institute between the cost of arms produced at Enfield and those manufactured by the trade were fallacious, because the same elements of cost were not included in both cases. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell) had had the audacity to allude to the circumstances that had characterized the supply of arms before and at the commencement of the Crimean war; he appeared to have forgotten that the mode in which the contracts for small arms were at that time conducted under his administration as Secretary for the Board of Ordnance was inquired into by a Committee in the year 1854, and that the result of that investigation was the breaking up of the late Ordnance establishment. For two years previous to 1854, only 22,000 small arms were ordered, a demand so limited as to have disorganized the trade; and then suddenly there was a large demand. In that year £34,000 was recommended by the Committee on Small Arms, and voted by the House for the enlargement and improvement of the Enfield establishment; but, far from being satisfied with this amount, a far larger sum, misappropriated from the Commissariat Vote, was spent upon the Enfield establishment by the Government, and yet during the war only 26,000 stand of arms were produced. Before the commencement of 1854 it was stated that the private trade could only be relied upon to make 50,000 stand of arms a year; but in less than two years it produced 272,000 stand. Those interested in the Enfield establishment were so infatuated with the belief that the natural resources of the trade of this country could not be trusted, that they sent for arms to Liège, St. Etienne, and the United States; but during the Crimean war not a single rifle was obtained from any of those places. Hon. Members appeared to discountenance the hon. Member for Rochdale's Motion, on the ground that it was impossible to rely on the arms trade of England for a supply of arms, and we had established the Enfield factory which had cost between £300,000 and £400,000. From year to year the arms trade of this country had been led on by the delusive hope that they were to be allowed to compete in the supply of their manufactures on fair terms, and Birmingham had in consequence been induced to establish a large factory with all the appliances of Enfield. It would, however, appear from the tone of the debate, that it was highly probable that no order for the supply of arms would be sent to Birmingham, so that the assurances on which the expenditure there had been based would not be adequately fulfilled. He rejoiced at the same time to say that the expense to which the Birmingham Company had gone was not likely to be thrown away, for if the Government of England declined to avail themselves of the private enterprise of the country, foreign nations had not yet arrived at the conclusion that the arms provided by the trade were unworthy of use. The result might, however, be that the Government might find the English manufacturers engaged in the execution of foreign contracts at a moment when we would stand greatly in need of their services.

MR. COBDEN rose, apparently with the intention of replying, when

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Gentleman that he had already spoken.

MR. COBDEN: Then I shall put myself in order by moving an Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has moved an Amendment, and cannot move another.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the case of Mr. O'Malley Irwin, and to submit that it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to inquire into that case, with a view to the affording of redress to Mr. Irwin. Though the case had occurred thirty years ago, yet if this gentleman had been unjustly treated he considered that it was the bounden duty of the Government to remedy the injustice under which this gentleman had suffered.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the circumstances of the case had occurred thirty years ago, and that all the persons who could throw light on it, except Mr. Irwin himself, were dead. In the year 1835 Mr. Irwin was twice tried, on the criminal charge of forging a letter from Mr. Johnstone, a revising barrister. The jury believed that the letter was a forgery, and convicted Mr. Irwin. On the second trial Mr. Johnstone was put into the box, and Mr. Irwin did not cross-examine him. Since then Mr. Irwin had presented several petitions of right, alleging misconduct against the Law Officers of the Crown, but not calling for inquiry. He (the Attorney General) could not promise any action on the part of the Crown, unless Mr. Irwin petitioned that House for inquiry, when it would be competent for the House to declare the course it would take.

MR. HENNESSY said, he believed that this was a case in which the grossest injustice had been done. [The hon. Member read several documents in support of the Motion.]

ADDRESS FOR CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO TREATIES.

LORD CAMPBELL* said: My Lords, I trust that I shall not oppose the wishes of the House in now proceeding with my notice, in spite of that which has been given by a noble Earl over the way, and which opens a wider field in regard to foreign policy. I should have been inclined to withdraw mine, although his was subsequently given and stands for a later day, were it not that such a course would deprive a noble Marquess near me (the Marquess of Clanricarde), long versed in these affairs, of the latest opportunity for discussing our present situation. My Lords, it will be easy to explain the question I propose to put, as to whether the Treaty of 1852 and the older Treaties relative to Schleswig have any further international validity, and the Motion I submit for recent correspondence on the subject. According to a general impression, the reverses and the losses our diplomacy has suffered impose some line of action, or at least suggest it, to redeem our credit, to reinstate our influence, and to indemnify the Continent to the greatest possible extent for the evils our discomfiture has lately brought upon it. But until these treaties are in some degree considered and disposed of, no such compensating line appears feasible or open. They bind us to uphold a past or at least an evanescent situation, and do not well admit of our being parties to a new one. They pledge us to sustain a fabric which is crumbling, and hardly seems to warrant us in building on the vacancy. At the same time, my Lords, it is far from my intention to disparage them. The proposition I have hazarded—namely, that a new line of action is required, would rather make it logical and just to dwell upon their gravity. The clearest ground for the necessity of diplomatic and political repair is that in the torrent of events we have departed from engagements not to be denied, and hitherto held sacred. As regards the Treaty of 1852, which is so familiar, nothing need be said, except that its apparent ruin is a serious disparagement to the country under whose auspices it came into existence, and by whom it has been so frequently and ineffectually appealed to. The gravity of those treaties by which the Duchy of Schleswig has been guaranteed to Denmark is based on more than one consideration. Although they date from 1720 they also date from 1814. It is a fallacy to think that they are buried like an ancient temple in the dust which ages heap upon it. At the end of the great war, the Treaty of Kiel revived and re-established them. Besides this, in 1826, Great Britain recognized and acted on treaties identical in scope, in character and circumstances. Mr. Canning, in defending the British expedition to the Tagus, stood upon two guarantees of Portugal—given, one in 1661, the other in 1703, and of which both were re-established at the Treaty of Vienna. It will thus be seen by your Lordships that the guarantees of Schleswig were coeval in their second birth with those of Portugal, and less remote in their original concession. The principle of Mr. Canning with regard to those of Portugal went to the extent that the faith and honour of the country were involved in their observance, no matter how great the risk it might contain, no matter how doubtful or minute the British interest connected with it. Mr. Canning, in his famous speech of December, 1826, was not the leader of a party only, but the organ of an empire. The country acted on the doctrine he advanced, and took a measure which, although it ended in the quick and bloodless victory of right, might have embroiled us not only with Spain, but France, and the three despotic Powers which impelled them against Portugal. If, therefore, and the point will hardly be contested, the guarantees of Portugal and the guarantees of Schleswig stand on the same basis, the indirect acknowledgment which the last received in 1826 was brilliant and emphatic. No English politician can see Schleswig torn from Denmark without the same regret, at least the same humiliation he would feel if Portugal was conquered. He must desire a compensation and a balance for a result by which the credit of Great Britain is so injuriously altered. But the lapse of treaties and oblivion of engagements is not the only ground for seeking a new policy. The general position of the Continent can hardly fail to offer us another. We cannot help observing every tendency and movement which Great Britain would desire to avert. We see France—to avoid all exaggeration—colder than she used to be. We see Russia and the German Powers obviously combining. If they were not combined, could Denmark have been trampled on? Do you believe the German Powers would have ventured on that course had Russia actively discountenanced it? If they had not combined, could Poland have been cast into a deeper tomb than that which formerly compressed her? If they had not combined, would Austria have been detached from the path on which a year ago it was the triumph of the Foreign Office to have set her, and from which she has relapsed into the ancient mire she had quitted? We see upon the Continent—these are facts which cannot be disputed—the objects of the country baffled, and her remonstrances despised. Let any one compare in foreign policy the Britain of 1815, or that of 1826, or that of 1841, with that of the present moment, and he must be tempted to indulge in terms which I, in order to avoid the semblance of heat, shall studiously refrain from. But what, my Lords, enhances the regret and adds to the desire of reparation; in any foreign capital we should hear something of the errors from which the situation had arisen. In Copenhagen we should hear that the despatch of September, 1862, had lent an impulse to the German movement which never afterwards subsided. This very day, a well-known journal has a letter from that city, alleging, what indeed we knew before, that its inhabitants attribute to that despatch the tide of evils which engulfs them. At Paris we should be informed that the obstacles presented by Great Britain to the Congress in November had altered the alliance, had estranged the Emperor, at the very moment when the death of the King of Denmark and the impending crisis made such consequences doubly alarming. And will any one at present venture to assert that the latent and contingent inconveniences, which, perhaps, resided in the project of a Congress, outweighed the broad and palpable calamities which its refusal has inflicted upon Europe. At St. Petersburg we should be told of the delusion which led our Foreign Office to count on Russia in the autumn, when our conduct on the Polish question had excited her resentment; when the Russian and the German objects were identical upon the Baltic; when the necessity and policy of Russia was to exchange support and succour both at Berlin and Vienna. In any capital the English traveller would hear that to insist upon the Conference without preliminary measures to support it was to run into inevitable failure. It was said before the Conference began—and this will be admitted—that success alone can vindicate a measure which at the outset all the world condemns as idle for its purpose. If it is true, my Lords, after a brief and unimpassioned view of what has happened, that our treaties have been sacrificed; if it is true that our objects have been baffled, and also that our errors are conspicuous, I venture to maintain that a desire must suggest itself for something in the nature of an indemnifying policy. To rescue Denmark is assumed to be impossible. But the fragment of that kingdom cannot stand alone without the territory which we have not been able to secure to it. It is hardly requisite to show that a nation composed of North Jutland and the Islands, reduced in population and revenue, no longer leading on the Baltic, without a military frontier, assailable by Germany from Schleswig, assailable by Germany on the sea coast, and at the same time the object of its wishes, would not be able to maintain itself. Eventually it must become absorbed in Germany, unless a Scandinavian union happens to preserve it. Both in Sweden and in Denmark a considerable party are known to lean to such an union. If the Treaty of 1852 is gone, dynastic circumstances favour it. Before now its advantages to Europe have been stated. But they are summed up in the jealousy with which—as the despatches before your Lordships show—it is regarded at St. Petersburg. What inspires that jealousy? A Scandinavian union could not act aggressively on Russia. Its population could not go beyond 10,000,000, while that of Russia, as your Lordships well know, is 70,000,000. The jealousy arises from the fact, and only from the fact, that such an union would retard the growth of Russian power on the Baltic. While Russia menaces the East, defies the Treaty of Vienna, detaches Austria from the wholesome concert in which the Western Powers had succeeded in engaging her, it is not our policy to encourage her maritime ambition on the Baltic. On the contrary, it seems to be our policy to check it. No doubt, my Lords, the union of the Scandinavian countries could not be promoted except by France and Great Britain cordially co-operating. Such a line could only be pursued with tenderness to vested rights, to popular ideas, and diplomatic complications. It could only be pursued by cautious steps and well concerted movements. But before it is denounced as visionary or irrelevant, your Lordships ought to glance at the alternative. The alternative contains a series of intelligible evils. When Denmark lapses altogether into Germany, you have to bear the unmitigated triumph of that false and hypocritical aggression, which has shocked us; the no less complete humiliation of the power whose diplomacy endeavoured to restrain it; the aggrandisement of Russia in the Baltic through her influence on Germany; the defencelessness of Sweden no longer fortified by Denmark; the right of any country strong enough to kindle war in Europe when its balance had so materially altered; the general decline of public law after the blows it would receive and the encroachments it would suffer in the event I am supposing. But whether or not we ought to favour Scandinavian union as the best result of the misfortunes which have happened to ourselves and to the world—dismissing altogether such a topic—it is still essential to determine the operation of the treaties which the notice has referred to. Were it our policy to make Denmark German, or to sustain her weak, denuded, and dismantled in her islands, the question would not be irrelevant. No line of action seems to be legitimate until we understand the manner in which the treaties bear upon us. It would be satisfactory, no doubt, if the Government would say that they continued to acknowledge them, that combinations might be yet formed for giving them effect, that it was not too late to rescue Denmark, and recover our honour. Such language all would hail, and nobody anticipates. It would be admissible, although not a source of pride, if the Government declared that overruling circumstances rendered it impossible to execute the treaties: that their utility was gone, and that the ground was cleared for a line of action they had hitherto debarred us from. But to connive at them, ignore them, hush them up; at one time to call them immaterial because the casus fœderis has not arisen, and when it has disastrously occurred to bury them in silence; to pretend that we are ready to enforce the guarantee of Prussian Saxony, while that of Schleswig perishes without apology before us, is inadmissible, derogatory to the Crown, and not to be encouraged by the Legislature. That course the Government will now have the opportunity of quitting. I will not detain your Lordships but move for the Correspondence I have asked for.

Moved,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copies of ~~any~~ recent Correspondence relating to the Treaties between Denmark and Great Britain."

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I do not think it necessary to follow my noble Friend in that part of his speech which relates to the position which this country holds in Europe. That subject has recently been ably discussed in both Houses of Parliament, and both Houses came to a decision upon it. To re-open that question would, to use a vulgar phrase, be like "serving mustard after dinner." I believe it would neither tend to promote the interests of the public service nor to advance the dignity of this House. The question, however, which the noble Lord has put is one of very considerable importance. The noble Lord asks whether the Treaty of 1720, with the additional sanction which it received from the Treaty of 1814, is still obligatory. The noble Lord stated that the validity of our ancient treaties with Portugal was recognized by Mr. Canning in 1826. But the facts of the two cases are perfectly dissimilar. We had had no war with Portugal to put an end to those treaties, but with Denmark we had had hostilities; and it is not only my opinion, but the opinion also of the Law Officers of the Crown, that the obligations of the Treaty of 1720 were put an end to by the war. The Treaty of Kiel, in 1814, prevented that treaty from having any force or obligation on this country. With regard to the Treaty of 1852; it contained no guarantee of any sort; and although the preamble showed the importance which the great Powers of Europe attached at that time to the independence and integrity of Denmark, yet the only obligations imposed upon this country, in common with the other signatories, was to acknowledge the succession as settled by that treaty. This we willingly and readily did as soon as the occasion presented itself. With regard to the present position of that treaty, on going into the Conference we found that we were the only nation who were satisfied to adhere to the treaty. Under those circumstances it became necessary to join with our co-signatories in agreeing to certain modifications of that treaty; and no doubt to that extent the treaty has been modified.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE doubted whether the noble Earl had quite correctly represented the fact as to the Treaty of Kiel, because he was under the impression that that treaty renewed all others which had been entered into with respect to Denmark. However, as we were not to support our opinions by force, he was glad that we were to have no more protocols about the Treaty of 1720. He was sorry to hear from his noble Friend that the Treaty of 1852 was still to be considered in force.

EARL GRANVILLE explained that he had stated the very reverse. He said that in the Conference the British Government finding themselves alone in their adherence to that treaty, had thought it politic to join with their co-signatories in agreeing to certain modifications of it.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE should then like to know what were the modifications which were agreed upon—because in the papers which had been produced there was no mention of any agreement as to modification. He regretted that there should be any agreement the effect of which might be to draw us into Conferences upon this subject again, either at Vienna or elsewhere; because he attached no importance to any conference or negotiations into which we might enter after a declaration more or less openly avowed that, come what might, we would not enforce our views or opinions as to the rights or obligations which were imposed upon other Powers either by the public law of Europe or by special treaties. [Earl GRANVILLE: I said nothing about going into another Conference.] He (the Marquess of Clanricarde) knew that, but he was afraid from what his noble Friend had said, and from other circumstances, that there was such a risk. When his noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs was good enough to attend that House and take part in their debates, he told them that no faith could be placed in the declarations of Austria, because she had not the power to control either her allies or her subjects, or to overcome contingencies which must force her to depart from her engagements. Should not that circumstance of itself act as a warning to prevent our entering into any more Conferences upon this subject? His noble Friend had in his speeches talked a good deal about moral influence; but moral influence was only effective when it was known that you were ready to support your views by force. If they were not prepared to do so he entreated the Government to go into no more Conferences. They had greatly injured the power of Denmark by the course which they had already taken, and no interference on their part would do her any good unless they were prepared to say that in certain cases, or in some case, or in any case, they were prepared to assert their opinions by force. He had as great a horror of revolution as any man, but it was better than total loss of liberty or submission to a foreign yoke. The revolutionists at present were not the Democrats but the Sovereigns. Could there be a greater revolutionist than he who now sat upon the throne of Prussia? A revolution had been effected in that country, and in order to carry it out and put down the constitution the King had not hesitated to invade Denmark.

LORD CAMPBELL, in reply, stated that according to Dr. Twiss in his well known work on the Danish Duchies, the Treaty of Kiel revived all our former treaties of amity with Denmark, and among them the guarantee of 1720. The controversy was between the noble Lord the President of the Council upon the one hand and Dr. Twiss upon the other. Since all parties in the State had acknowledged the guarantees in 1848, Dr. Twiss could not be denied to have the balance of authority. At the same time he (Lord Campbell) admitted that if the guarantees were not enforced, it was better for the country and the world they should not be held valid.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

NEW ZEALAND (GUARANTEE OF LOAN) BILL—(No. 233.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL GRANVILLE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, he thought it was, as a general rule, undesirable that this country should guarantee loans raised for colonial purposes. Such a course must tend, in his opinion, to encourage a large increase in the expenditure of a colony. At the same time, it was impossible for the mother country to divest herself entirely of responsibility for her colonies, especially in case of war; and the circumstances of the present case were so exceptional and so strong, that he thought it impossible for their Lordships to refuse their assent to this Bill. With regard to the origin and commencement of the war now being waged in New Zealand, he believed it to be a just war, for there could be no doubt that the immediate cause of it was the murder of British subjects by the Maories. The struggle which ensued had been a very severe one, and there could be no doubt that in the struggle the colonists had greatly exerted themselves. There was, he believed, no foundation for the charge that they had supplied arms and ammunition to the Natives, to be used against themselves and us. No doubt, in a free country, and in peaceable times, the Natives had had abundant opportunities of providing themselves with arms; but it was utterly incredible that at a time when the whole male population of the colony were combined against the Natives, that any portion of them would be allowed by the rest to furnish arms to the insurgents to be used against themselves. In consequence of the expenses occasioned by the war, and the consequences of the disturbed state of things, the colony were compelled to have recourse to a loan; but they experienced great difficulty in obtaining it, and they then applied to the Government for a guarantee. One of the great objections, so far as he had been able to ascertain, against the proposed guarantee was founded on the alleged insufficiency of the resources of the colony, but, after the most careful consideration of the point, both on the part of the Colonial Office and the Treasury, the conclusion had been arrived at that the security was satisfactory. The revenue of the colony was largely increasing, and although no doubt the expenditure was also increasing, yet on a comparison of the ordinary income with the ordinary expenditure, there was a surplus of revenue of £260,000; and besides the ordinary revenue there was a large sum derived annually from the sale of waste lands. Moreover, and above the advantage of assisting the colony in its difficulty, there would be this further advantage in giving the Imperial guarantee asked for by the Bill, that the mother country would receive out of the loan to be raised the immediate repayment of the sum of £500,000, in which the colony was already indebted to us. He did not attach much importance to this, except in one respect—that it at once wiped away a cause of irritation between the mother country and the colony which had at various times been found to be exceedingly inconvenient. With respect to the termination of the war, he could only say that the Government were anxious that it should be brought to a close at the earliest possible moment; and, to that end, they had by their last despatch invested Sir George Grey with summary powers over the movements of the troops in New Zealand; and Governor Sir George Grey, in writing on the subject on the 7th of April last, said—

“I can have no hesitation in saying that the wishes and instructions of his Grace the Duke of Newcastle impose on me as a duty that which is entirely in consonance with my own feelings and with yours—namely, that I should instantly listen to any reasonable overtures that the Natives in arms may make, and that I should avail myself of any opportunity that offers of obtaining permanent peace for this colony. I am quite confident that general public opinion in this country will support me in taking this course and would expect me to do so. With regard to the confiscation of portions of the lands of the Natives now in arms, this point has to be considered—that merely requires that future contests between the two races should in as far as practicable be prevented, and that there are many tribes in New Zealand who have taken no part in the present lamentable conflicts, yet who might hereafter be led into similar acts; while nothing would more certainly lead to the extermination of the Native race than a series of contests such as that which is now being carried on. The object of the local Government, therefore, has been to secure to that numerous part of the Native population who have taken no active share in the present war the whole of their landed possessions, and also by laws passed expressly for this object, to give to the lands held by such Natives a value greater than they have previously had for their owners, by in all respects giving them equal rights in their landed possessions with those enjoyed by their European fellow-subjects, the intention in this respect being to show that the rights of peaceable citizens of whatever race are carefully respected, and to give the Natives so valuable a stake in the country that they are not likely hereafter to regard it lightly. On the other hand, it was thought necessary by an example to show that those who rose in arms against their fellow-subjects of another race, suffered such a punishment for doing so as might deter others from embarking in a similar career. It is therefore proposed to deprive such persons of a considerable portion of their landed properties, and to provide for the future safety of the colony by occupying such lands with an European population. But even in the case of these persons it is intended that sufficient lands shall be reserved for themselves and their descendants, to be held on the same tenure as lands are henceforth to be secured to the rest of the Native population. That these measures will be carried out in a spirit of liberal generosity and mercy I earnestly hope, and will do my best to insure, and I believe that I shall be supported by a large majority in this colony."

The despatch of his right hon. Friend at the head of the Colonial Office giving the general support of the Home Government to the policy would, he believed, enable Sir George Grey to carry out his liberal and just scheme in a manner which would have the effect of securing permanent peace for the colony.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."—(The Lord President.)

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he had not intended to make any observations on the Bill, but in the absence of his noble Friend the Earl of Carnarvon, who took a great interest in the subject, he could not allow the Bill to pass without making a few observations on the nature of the proposal. The apologetical tone in which the noble Earl had introduced the Bill, was certainly by no means misplaced, for a more questionable measure had never come before Parliament. The feeling of the country had been unmistakably manifested against the principle of the Bill, and there was now firmly established in the public mind a complete conviction that a colony, when once it had arrived at a certain point of power and prosperity ought to defend itself against its natural enemies, and ought not to call on the mother country for the aid of Imperial troops. With respect to Canada, we could not too soon persuade the people of that country that it was impossible for them to obtain Imperial assistance in the way of English troops. If they were attacked by the Indians, or by their neighbours of the same race with themselves, they were now strong enough, prosperous enough, and populous enough to do without British troops, and any help which they asked from us must be in the way of naval assistance and guns and materiel of war; but they ought to find their own men, and defend their own frontier. The same principle applied to New Zealand. There certainly were no restless aggressive elements in Canada, but the same compliment could not be paid to the Government of New Zealand. Colonists of New Zealand had obtained from this country powers of self-government, and since then they had kept up a constant quarrel with the Natives. They had done nothing to reconcile the Natives to their rule, and if they became engaged in consequence in a war with the Natives—which should be regarded in the light of a civil war—they ought to learn how to take care of themselves, and not to call on this country for some 10,000 or 12,000 soldiers, thus draining our small army, and staving off the retribution for their mismanagement at our expense. If they had had themselves to pay and to bleed for their own defence, we should have heard very little of the present difficulties, and when people had to pay their own expenses, the amount was far less than if they could send in their bills to other parties for payment. There was another point with respect to the defence of the colonies by our troops. He saw no reason why British soldiers alone should be sent to carry on these colonial wars. The Romans did not send Italian soldiers into Syria, Britain, or any of their colonies; they sent the troops of the countries which they had conquered and occupied, and in the same way he never could understand why some of our Indian regiments, the Sikh regiments, should not be employed in our colonial wars. He looked on this Bill as an encouragement to all colonies in the same position as New Zealand to quarrel with the Natives, and get up little wars of which they were sure not to bear the burden. He had no wish to divide the House against the Bill, but he looked upon it as a most impolitic measure, and was astonished how it could have received the assent of the House of Commons. He believed that if the public purse were in the hands of their Lordships instead of in the hands of the House of Commons, a much more economical system would be adopted. The House of Commons was by far too generous in many respects, and it sanctioned many things which never would have passed their Lordships. He thought this war in New Zealand was unholy and unjust, and that every drop of blood shed and every guinea spent upon it was wasted.

LORD LYVEDEN said, he believed there was a pretty general concurrence in the principle laid down by the noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury), that every colony should bear its own expenses; but though this principle was undoubtedly sound, the difficulty lay in the application of it; and he would take the liberty of reminding their Lordships that every successive Colonial Secretary had, in his own despite, been dragged into a colonial war, with all its attendant cost. The noble Earl suggested the employment of Indian troops in New Zealand; but did the noble Earl mean to saddle the Indian exchequer with the cost? He was afraid that this important measure had not been sufficiently considered. It was introduced to the House of Commons at a very late period of the Session—so late, in fact, that a discussion was out of the question even in that House; and if their Lordships could, according to the rules of the House, discuss the measure—which he believed they were not able to do—there was not time for it. The only valuable part of the Bill was that which was not in it when it was introduced into the Commons. He alluded to the proviso at the end of the second clause, which provided that the guarantee should not come into operation until the Colonial Legislature had passed such measures as were required by the Secretary of State to secure the repayment of the loan, as well as the cost of the British troops employed in the colony. But this was a new clause. If the Bill had passed in its original shape it would have been quite possible that the Colonial Legislature might not have taken steps to provide for the repayment of the loan. The colony was at war. We said it was the war of the colonists; they said it was an Imperial war, produced by carrying out the measures of the Home Government, and compelling them to deal with the Natives in a particular manner of which they did not approve. The colonists added that they would not have been in their present unfortunate position if they had been left to themselves. Being in this state of distress, they sought a loan, which they asked the Home Government to guarantee. They wanted a loan of £3,000,000; and the Government consented to grant a guarantee for £1,000,000. What was to be done with regard to the other £2,000,000? The colonists said they found a difficulty in procuring a loan themselves. Doubtless there must be a difficulty in obtaining the money at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; but there would be no difficulty if they gave the market price, say of 7 per cent. We should adopt the principle of refusing to guarantee any loans whatever. We had refused to do so in the case of India, although we should have thereby saved to the Indian treasury a very large sum of money. It was unfair to say that the murders which had been the origin of this war could be traced to any other source than the question of land. Sir George Grey, in one of his despatches to the Duke of Newcastle, expressly said that if the colonists were resolved to take the lands of the Natives they must be prepared to abide by the consequences. He (Lord Lyveden) was of opinion that the war was not likely to be brought to a speedy conclusion, for but little had been done to mitigate the hostility between the Natives and the settlers. He quite agreed in thinking that guaranteeing the loan was guaranteeing everything that had been done by the settlers to the Natives, and, while the saving would be small, the loss in point of principle would be great. Everyone must regret the loss of life which had taken place, and they were told that the troops were utterly disgusted with the service on which they were engaged. That might or might not be true, but it was an awful responsibility for any one to incur to proceed with a war which it was believed at home could not be proved to be quite just, and which was certainly not one upon which this country would be justified in expending its resources. In the present state of the House it would be useless to divide against the Bill, but he thought it right to enter his protest.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I cannot allow an observation which has just fallen from the noble Lord (Lord Lyveden)—namely, that the war is viewed with utter disgust by the British troops—to pass unnoticed. We all must regret the misfortune which has happened to a distinguished regiment; but I wish in the strongest manner to protest against the impression getting abroad that any of Her Majesty's troops, in whatever service they are employed, so long as they are employed by Her Majesty's Government, perform the service on which they are sent with the slightest disgust. Discipline and obedience constitute the means by which an army is held together and prevented from becoming a useless collection of men. It is the duty of the Government to decide on what service the troops shall be employed; and, as is well known, Parliament can dissent from any measure adopted by the Government; but it is the duty of the troops implicitly to obey any order and command they receive from those under whom they are placed. I firmly believe that there is no foundation for the impression that the cause of the misfortune which has recently occurred is that the troops did not like the service on which they were engaged. If there were the slightest foundation for such a suspicion, I should sincerely deplore that any of Her Majesty's troops should have become so undisciplined. I cannot concur in some of the observations which have fallen from the noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury). So long as this country possesses colonies it cannot be expected that the British troops shall not be employed in them, and I cannot imagine that the noble Earl meant to say that Indian troops would have behaved better than British troops.

LORD LYVEDEN explained that what he said was that he believed that an impression, however false, prevailed in the colony that the troops felt disgust with the service on which they were employed.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that in speaking respecting the employment of British troops in the colonies he had in mind that the colonies were of two descriptions. He never intended to suggest that we were not to employ British troops in Gibraltar, Bermudas, and Malta, which were not so much colonies as military stations. But when colonies had increased to such an extent of prosperity as to have 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 of inhabitants, it seemed hard that they should not find men enough to form regiments to defend themselves. He did not pretend to say that the Indian troops were superior to the English troops; but he was sure the illustrious Duke would agree with him that they were very good troops. He considered that the Sikhs might be made available for service in the colonies, and thus release the British troops for other service.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he would not follow the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury) into the very large question of the employment of British troops in our colonies. But there was one thing which he wanted to know, and that was, where the colony was to be found in which there were seven millions of inhabitants? When we arrived at that time in which colonies of ours should have such a large population, the whole question would have assumed a very different aspect. The question was a wide but was altogether one of relative population and wealth; but, at any rate, it could not be discussed in the present state of the House and of the Session. With regard to the war which had arisen in New Zealand, noble Lords had spoken as if it had its origin entirely in the policy, and was the fault of the Colonial Government, and as though the Natives were in no wise to blame. But such was not the case. The war had its origin in a cruel and cowardly murder committed upon a body of English troops passing from one station to another, who were surprised by an ambush, and two officers and seven men were killed and others wounded. That outrage took place, it should be remembered, after the arrival of Sir George Grey, a Governor in whom the Natives professed to have the greatest confidence, who had always been regarded as their friend, and who had been sent out after the outbreak of the previous war on account of the special qualifications which he possessed for the office. It was not, then, from any desire on the part of the Colonial Government to exterminate the Natives that this war had arisen. Under these circumstances, he did not think there was any one of their Lordships who would say that it was right to let such an outrage as that to which he had alluded pass unpunished. Measures were in consequence resorted to which led to general hostilities; but it was the desire of Her Majesty's Government to bring the hostilities to a conclusion at the earliest possible period. Noble Lords had talked as if Her Majesty's Government were determined to bear the whole expense of the war, to send out any number of British troops, and to leave the colonists to reap the benefits of supplying the commissariat. But that was not true. In the first place, the colonists bore a considerable portion of the expenditure; next, they had raised 10,000 volunteers who had served with credit in the field; and the illustrious Duke would bear him out when he said that their officers and men had been often mentioned with distinction in the despatches. The colonists were bearing the expenses of that force and various other charges incident to the war. Besides, the Colonial Secretary had lately given notice that, from the 1st of January of the next year, the colony would have to pay £45 a man for every one of our troops employed there, a payment calculated to cover the entire expenses of the troops. Under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government were not open to the charge of being ready to expend the blood and treasure of this country for the objects of the colonists of New Zealand. But we ought not to have left our countrymen in that colony entirely without protection. He thought the course which had been adopted would bring the war to a speedy conclusion; because the colonists, if what noble Lords said was true, would, when they had to pay the whole expenses of the war, take measures to bring it to an end as soon as possible.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE said, the Bill now before their Lordships had been brought from the House of Commons, and being a money Bill it was not competent for their Lordships to alter it. At the same time it was matter of surprise to hear the arguments put forward on both sides of the House—first, on the side of the Government, who entered into a protest against the application of the principle, while his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury) not only protested against the application of the principle, but was decidedly opposed to the measure itself. Now, it was a painful thing to one holding an independent position in that House, to observe so often a contradiction between the principle enunciated and its application; and he must say it would be far better for the honour of that House and the interests of the country if greater harmony was observed between the two. Now, if there was one principle more clear than another, it was that where a colony had been allowed by Act of Parliament to have a Constitution and Legislature of its own it ought at least to incur the expenses consequent on managing its own affairs. Some assistance might, in the first instance, be accorded by the mother country in order to help the colony in getting into a proper condition; but it would not be too much for the mother country to expect after a short time that the charge of administering its own affairs and protecting itself should be borne by the colony. It was, however, a painful thing for any one who had the honour of his country at heart to hear doubts thrown out as to the capacity of this country to protect our colonies. If unfortunately it should happen at some future time, either from the increase of the power of other countries or the reduction of our own, that we should be reduced to the necessity of abandoning our colonies, there was no necessity for anticipating any such thing, and it was much to be regretted that those anticipations could have only the effect of adding to the chances of such an event. The interests of this country would be much better consulted by waiting until such circumstances should arise and then meeting the matter with calmness. He quite agreed with the illustrious Duke that any course which seemed to admit a choice on the part of troops employed in the field would be utterly subversive of discipline and most injurious to the country whose servants they were.

LORD TAUNTON said, that it was a folly to expect that we could give representative institutions to a colony, and yet protect the land of the Natives from encroachment. All the late difficulties in New Zealand might, in his opinion, be traced to the Treaty of Waitangi, which was a great mistake in every respect. The moment that we gave the colonists popular institutions—the moment we obliged the Governor of New Zealand to follow the advice of responsible Ministers, who were themselves dependent on the votes of the Assemblies—the Government at home was placed in a position of the utmost embarrassment with the Colonial Government, and was placed in a position with regard to the Natives which it was impossible to carry out. He had heard with the greatest gratification the statement of his noble Friend (Earl Granville), that Her Majesty's Government were doing all that could be expected in order to place all the parties in New Zealand on a more satisfactory footing. He should be sorry that the present opportunity should be lost without obtaining some guarantee from the colonists for the future security of the Natives. Sir George Grey was a friend of the Maories, and he was sure that everything that could be done by him would be done to remedy existing evils. It was very easy to say, leave the black men and the white men to settle matters between themselves. If any Government in this country were to do so, it would excite a cry of indignation from one part of this island to the other. He had heard declamations against the employment of British troops in the colonies, and it was undoubtedly right to encourage the colonists to fight for themselves; but it was utterly impossible to say that circumstances might not arise in a wide-spread empire like ours in which British soldiers might be usefully employed in the colonies for the interests of this country. His experience in colonial affairs satisfied him that a few British troops were often of essential service in a colony. At the time of the gold discoveries a very few English soldiers saved Australia from a state of things that would have been most disgraceful. In California, under similar circumstances, all law was set aside. But public opinion in this country would not have allowed such a state of affairs to arise in Australia. He could by no means agree with those who laid down the principle that, under no circumstances, should British soldiers be employed in our colonies. Averse as he was to the principle of giving the security of this country for loans to the colonies, there were, he thought, exceptional cases in which the credit of the Imperial Government might usefully step in to the relief of the colonists, and that without loss to this country. The Legislature had done this on similar occasions, and there were very few cases in which the mother country had lost by the guarantee, while a great deal of good had been done. He thought that if ever there was a case in which the assistance of the Imperial Government might be properly given this was one, and he would therefore support the Bill.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that if he understood correctly the circumstances of the loan, and the new regulations with respect to the payment of troops, he could not understand how the various charges upon the colony could be met. He understood that the colony had now a surplus revenue of £200,000 a year. It was about to raise a loan of £3,000,000—£1,000,000 upon the guarantee of this country, and £2,000,000 upon the credit of the colony. The colonists would have to pay upon the first loan at 4 per cent £40,000, and upon the remainder £120,000, making altogether an annual charge of £160,000, which would leave £40,000 clear surplus. But then, after the 1st of January next, the colony would be called upon to pay £45 a man for every British soldier employed there, making for 10,000 men a sum of £450,000 a year. This would leave a deficit of £400,000 a year from the 1st of next January.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE agreed with the Secretary for War that it was impossible to withdraw Her Majesty's troops under existing circumstances, and leave the colonists to bear the whole brunt of the present war. But a very serious question remained behind—what was to be the policy of this country when the present war was concluded? There were two distinct courses of policy—one, imitating the policy of our ancestors with respect to the North American colonists, to leave it to the settlers to deal with the Natives as they thought fit, and to leave it also to them to fight it out if any quarrel arose; or, on the other hand, the Imperial Government might take into their own hands the whole of the relations between the settlers and the Natives, placing the government of the colony in reference to dealings with the Natives under the command of the Colonial Secretary without any interference on the part of the Government of the colony. If they adopted the latter course they would necessarily have to support the Governor in the event of any dispute between the two races. He could conceive Her Majesty's Government adopting one or other of the two courses; but the Government did not seem to have made up their minds either to give the settlers control of their affairs in reference to the Natives, or to take the control themselves. Now if Her Majesty's Government halted between these two opinions and allowed the colonists to interfere to a certain extent, whilst the Imperial Government themselves also interfered somewhat, they would have the disadvantages of both systems and the advantages of neither. He must join in protesting against the guarantee being given, and for his part he would rather that a sum of money should be given to the colony than that the debt should be guaranteed.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, it was not always safe to leave these affairs in the hands of the colonists as our experience in North America showed. In North America the colonists waged a war of extermination with the Natives and the Red Indians, in which the Indians were shot down like kangaroos. That might be an economical system, but he doubted whether the country would allow it to be pursued in the present day. Each of these causes must be judged distinctly and on its own merits. In time of war the mother country could form alliances for its protection; but the colonists were not allowed to have allies, and we must, therefore—wisely and judiciously of course—give them assistance in periods of difficulty. He did not recollect that noble Lords opposite while they were in office proposed to throw all these burdens upon the colonists.

EARL GRANVILLE thought that the principles which had been laid down during this debate were excellent, provided that they were accompanied by certain checks; but that it was wrong to lay down those principles without any restriction whatever. As to what the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) had said in reference to financial matters, it must be borne in mind that it was not contemplated that the colonists should keep 10,000 troops there for an indefinite time; and one purpose of this loan was to provide for the extra expense incurred whilst the additional troops were there. It was proposed that £1,000,000 only should be borrowed at present; and it was to be hoped that there would be no occasion for the further loan of £2,000,000. This being so, he believed that the surplus revenue in the colony would be amply sufficient to pay the interest which was guaranteed.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

PILOTAGE ORDER CONFIRMATION (No. 2) BILL—(No. 235.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2.^a"—(Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

LORD REDESDALE opposed the Motion. The Bill was not introduced into the House of Commons until the 30th of June—the very day which, according to their Lordships Sessional Order, was the last upon which Bills should be read a second time. This Bill was to carry into effect certain regulations in reference to the Tyne, and persons interested in the matter had no opportunity of stating their objections to the Bill. If the Bill were pressed forward he did not think that justice would be done to those who desired to oppose it, and therefore he should vote against the second reading.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY observed, that the Provisional Orders upon which this Bill was founded had been well considered, and the parties objecting had had an opportunity of being heard. The Sessional Order fixing the time beyond which Bills should not be read a second time in their Lordships' House did not apply to a Bill of this kind. He thought the noble Lord had hardly treated him fairly in asking him to postpone the Bill from Friday until to-day, to give time for presenting petitions, and now opposing the Bill. As to the petitions which had been presented against the Bill, there was plenty of time for the Select Committee to consider them in the usual course.

VISCOUNT MELVILLE objected to the Bill being forced on without proper time being allowed.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE thought that the Bill should have been introduced earlier into the other House.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE felt that an useful measure ought not to be sacrificed upon a mere matter of form; but this being an important Bill, against which petitions had been presented, it certainly could not be fairly considered by a Select Committee sitting in the last week of the Session.

EARL GRANVILLE reminded their Lordships that he had promised, on the part of the Government, that they would not advise Her Majesty to prorogue Parliament this week, if the Select Committees of that House required a few days more to get through their business. The Government would not advise proceeding with the Bill if the Select Committee thought further time was required.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY thought that there was no excuse for this Bill not being brought up to their Lordships' House before Friday last, and he objected to their being called on to proceed in a hurry with it. He should like to know what excuse the Board of Trade had for not introducing this Bill earlier in the Session.

LORD REDESDALE admitted that the Sessional Order did not prevent this Bill being read a second time. It was his own fault that it did not. The Bill belonged to a class of Bills which, under the Act which gave power to the Board of Trade to introduce them, were to be treated in the same way as Private Bills, namely, by reference to a Select Committee. Inclosure and Board of Health Bills were under the Sessional Orders relating to Private Bills, and no doubt Pier and Harbour Bills ought to be included. He did not believe that the parties who were opposed to this Bill could receive justice if it were now proceeded with.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY thought, as Metropolitan Railway Bills had been considered in Committee up to that very day, there could be no reason against proceeding with this, which was essentially a public measure. There was no reason why a Select Committee should not do justice to the case of the petitioners.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY reminded the noble Lord that he had not informed the House why the Bill was brought in so late.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that it was often late in the Session before the parties interested could come to such an agreement among themselves as to apply to the Board of Trade to confirm an order. This Bill had been under discussion in the district to which it was to apply for the last six months.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE thought that justice required that the Bill should not be read a second time at that period of the Session.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Three Months"): Question, That ("now") stand Part of the Motion? Resolved in the Affirmative:

PUBLIC WORKS (MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS) BILL—(No. 237.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord President.)

THE EARL OF LEITRIM wished to know why the Government did not propose to assist public works in Ireland, especially as the blow which had fallen on the manufacturers of Lancashire had been felt with double severity in the sister country?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that when some years since great distress prevailed in Ireland this country cheerfully agreed to a large loan of money for public works in that country, but he believed that a large portion of it had not yet been repaid. This was not a grant of money, but a loan on excellent security.

THE EARL OF POWIS called attention to the rate of interest to be paid under the Bill. Since 1859 the rate of interest for money to be employed on public works that were executed not for profit, had been reduced by a Treasury Minute to 4 per cent, and he asked why in this case the interest required to be paid was only 3½ per cent?

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

POOR REMOVAL BILL—(No. 239.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Wodehouse.)

LORD REDESDALE protested against the practice so frequently adopted with regard to Government Bills, of hurrying through important measures without allowing sufficient time for considering their provisions. The decision in the Queen's Bench that had rendered this Bill necessary was given on the 28th May, but this Bill was not introduced into the other House until after midnight on Monday last, the 18th July; it passed all its other stages after midnight; and was read a third time on Friday night; it was brought into their Lordships' House on Saturday, and was now to be read a second time to-night. The Poor Law Board ought to have brought the Bill in much earlier, so as to have allowed their Lordships more time for its consideration.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

THE FRESCOES IN THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

MR. HERBERT, R.A.

LORD REDESDALE in moving an Address for

Copy of the Report of the Commissioners lately appointed on the Fresco Paintings in the Palace of Westminster, and of a Letter addressed by Lord Redesdale to those Commissioners in relation to the continued Occupation of the Peers Robing Room for the purpose of such Paintings by which the Peers attending certain Committees have been so long subjected to great Inconvenience, said, it would be in the recollection of the House that three years ago a Commission had been appointed to inquire into the manner in which a certain room appropriated to one of the Committees of the House had been kept from that use by being occupied by an artist who was decorating it. The Committee was very indulgent to the artist, and contented itself by expressing a hope that he would give up possession of the room at the earliest possible moment. Three years had since elapsed, and he had felt it his duty to call attention to the fact. He thought that the room should not be decorated by any more paintings. The artist, Mr. Herbert, had managed the lights with great skill on the wall which he had selected; but he believed that if any further paintings were placed on the other walls the arrangement of the light was such that they would not be seen to the same advantage as the excellent work with which the artist had already decorated the room. Besides it was not altogether desirable that paintings should be placed in a room intended for business. It always attracted a constant flow of visitors, but being placed opposite the door persons coming in could see it without much moving about; if, however, paintings were placed on all the four walls, the visitors would be always moving about the room, to the great disturbance of business. If any further paintings were desired, the Painted Chamber was open to decoration; but he hoped something would be done to restore the Committee-room to which he referred as soon as possible to the use for which it was intended.

LORD TAUNTON, as a member of the Commission, said, the Commission had presented its Report, and there would, no doubt, be no objection, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, to produce the documents moved for. In the present case the Commissioners had thought it right to recommend a considerable increase upon the sum agreed to be paid for Mr. Herbert's picture, which he believed the public had seen with the greatest admiration. In doing that, however, the Commissioners had recommended that the contract should be broken, and that either party should be free to enter into a fresh engagement, before any new work was begun. There was but one circumstance which they thought justified the re-opening of such a contract, and that was the novelty of the process employed—namely, the water-glass process; but as sufficient experience had now been obtained, he hoped that the precedent would not hereafter be followed. The Commissioners had expressed their opinion that it was not for the honour of British artists, nor was it just to the British public, that engagements they had entered into of this nature should be violated, and nothing could tend more to discourage the Government from entering into engagements with artists than to find that they were afterwards subject to great expenses which they had not contemplated, and that it was impossible to lay on the table of the House any reliable estimates of the cost of these pictures. The noble Lord would see that it was for the Government to say whether they would think it right to go on with the work in the rest of the room. The noble Lord had alluded to a letter which he wrote to the Commissioners. That letter had engaged the attention of the Commissioners, but they had not inserted it in the appendix to their Report, as it was not on the subject immediately referred to them.

Lord Reddick

EARL NELSON thought it due to Mr. Herbert to state that that gentleman was not justly liable to the accusations which had just been brought forward. The original work which Mr. Herbert had undertaken was of a very different character from the one he had executed, and which might have been finished in a much shorter time. Indeed Mr. Herbert had made considerable progress in it; what he had done

STANDING ORDERS REVISION.

REPORT.

Report from Select Committee read; Standing Orders, as revised by the Committee, read.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he rose, pursuant to the notice he had given, to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Select Committee on the Revision of Standing Orders. He would not detain the House by repeating any of the arguments which he used on a former occasion when he moved for the appointment of the Committee. He would merely state that the Committee, after much consideration, resolved to recommend the adoption of the Resolutions he had had the honour to submit. If he could persuade the House to agree to the Report of the Committee, next Session, Referees would be appointed by the Speaker, who would have, in connection with Private Bills, to determine certain facts, the investigation of which would thus be withdrawn from the Committees of the House. There was some delay in coming to a conclusion, in consequence of the reluctance of the Speaker

jects to be submitted to the Referees. He inferred from the recent discussion that the disposition of hon. Members was not unfavourable to the experiment. For his own part, he would undertake, if the Resolutions did not accomplish the object with which they had been proposed, to save the time of the House and to diminish the expense to persons promoting or opposing Bills, to move their repeal at the earliest moment. He hoped, however, that they would prove successful. The Committee had agreed, not unanimously, but by a large majority, to recommend an important change in the Standing Orders of the House, that Private Bill Committees should each consist of three instead of five Members. He was one of those who had doubted the expediency of so great an alteration, and he at first proposed that the number should be reduced to four; but there was much to be said for the larger reduction. At present three formed a quorum, and as, under the new rule, the proceedings would be suspended in the absence of any of the three Members, there would practically be no change. Another alteration which was recommended with the view of expediting the private business of the House, and of advancing Bills early in the Session, was that the time allowed for petitions should be ten clear days after the first reading, instead of eight days after the second reading. There were some further alterations of minor importance to which he need not refer in detail; but, in conclusion, he would express his belief that if these proposals were carried out, Private Bill legislation would be conducted in a more satisfactory manner, and they would not have Bills delayed till the end of the Session, so that it was scarcely possible for them to be considered in the other House. He moved the repeal of the present Standing Orders relative to Private Bills.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to ask, whether the object of the Motion was to give the House a clear sheet of paper for the introduction of a new series of Standing Orders?

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that was the object of the Motion. That course had always been adopted on former occasions.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH asked, whether the proposed Resolutions contained any provision to the effect that the Referee was not to be a Member of the House?

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that the Resolutions contained no such provision; on the contrary, it was proposed that the Chairman of the Referees should be the Chairman of Ways and Means.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he could not help thinking that so important a subject should have been brought forward earlier in the year, and he suspected that, considering the period of the Session, and the attendance at the Committee, they had arrived at what was rather a foregone conclusion. He confessed that he had no great hope that the new system would lead to any reduction in expense. He even feared it would be attended with the opposite result. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had, however, in some degree disarmed opposition by pledging himself to move the repeal of the Resolutions if they did not prove effectual in saving the time of the House and the money of suitors.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that he hoped sincerely that the House would adopt the proposition of his hon. and gallant Friend. All the Members attended the Committee, and gave the subject most careful consideration. The Resolutions had, in substance, been explained to the House previously.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he understood his hon. and gallant Friend to undertake that if the new plan was not found satisfactory he would propose its repeal. He was, however, afraid that it was exactly in the fact that it was an experiment that the real danger lay, and that it might be the first step towards taking away from the Committees of that House their jurisdiction over Private Bills.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he questioned very much the expediency of leaving engineering questions to be decided by Referees, and the other questions connected with Private Bills to the Members of the Select Committee. Experience had, he thought, proved that whenever the attempt had been made to divide a judicial inquiry into two parts to be dealt with by separate tribunals, the system had operated unsatisfactorily. He, however, did not intend to oppose the proposition of the hon. and gallant Member, but he thought that its practical effect would be to make these matters of inquiry more expensive and less satisfactory.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he wished to correct the answer which he had given to the hon. Member behind him in respect to the appointment of Referees. Now, as there was a small salary attached to the office of Referee, the Chairman of Ways and Means, who was to be Chairman of Referees, could not appoint a Member of that House unless he resigned his seat. He would begin by moving the adoption of the new Standing Order No. 7, which proposed that the numbers of the Select Committee should be three instead of five.

Standing Order No. 7, as amended by the Committee, read, as follows:—

"7. The Committee on every opposed Railway and Canal Bill, or Group of Railway and Canal Bills, shall be composed of three Members not locally or otherwise interested in the Bill or Bills referred to them; the Chairman to be appointed by the General Committee on Railway and Canal Bills, and two other Members by the Committee of Selection."

MR. SPEAKER said, that the new Standing Order itself proposed to effect the reduction to three Members, and if nobody objected to it, the new Standing Order would pass.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, that such a reduction was open to great objection. In the Committee of which he was a Member that Session two of the Members were taken suddenly ill and were obliged to absent themselves. Now, if there were to be only three Members on the Committee, in the event of such a contingency, the inconvenience would be obvious.

Amendment proposed, in line 2, to leave out the word "three," in order to insert the word "five,"—(Mr. Henry Baillie,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'three' stand part of the Standing Order."

MR. WATKIN said, he wished to ask whether the reduction was proposed for the convenience of individual Members of that House. The public interest, he thought, would suffer by leaving Private Bills to be decided by Committees of only three Members, instead of five.

LORD HOTHAM said, he could not concur in the proposed reduction the practical effect of which would be that Committees would consist of two Members only! That would not be satisfactory to the public. He should not so much object to a Committee of four.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, it had been felt, in the discussions on that matter which had taken place in the Committee, that if they had Committees of four Members, too great power would be thrown in the hands of the Chairman, who would have a casting vote where the Members were equally divided in opinion. On that ground, after considerable discussion, the Committee determined to recommend that the Committees should be constituted of three Members. The most experienced Parliamentary agents were of opinion that as much weight of authority would be carried by a decision of a Committee of three as of a Committee of five. Under the system at present in operation, the amount of business to be done being so enormous, hon. Members had to endure a very severe demand upon them, and, in fact, that mode of carrying on the business was breaking down. The House must contemplate the alternative of reducing that pressure, or that of taking that business away from the House altogether. His noble Friend (Lord Hotham), he knew, had always deprecated the notion of taking the business away from the House, but, in order to retain the jurisdiction in that House, some reform of the present system must be adopted, which would give satisfaction to the public on the one hand and afford a relief to Members on the other hand.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he did not believe that the decision of a smaller number would carry so much weight as that of a greater number. He would also point out that if the reduced Committees were to be selected, as at present, from all the Members of the House, the inexperienced would rely upon the more experienced, and thus upon the Chairman of a Committee would devolve most of the labour and responsibility of the inquiry.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he thought the decision of a Committee of three would have as much, if not greater, weight than that of five, because of the responsibility being less divided.

MR. PAULL said, that in his opinion the House ought to hesitate long before it altered the constitution of the Committees. Too much was made of the tax put on hon. Members to serve on Committees. No doubt there was some inconvenience, but so long as the House chose to keep those matters within their own jurisdiction, the only question to be considered was what arrangement would be most satisfactory to the public. If the number were reduced to three, great difficulties might arise. Should one Member be absent, and the inquiry proceed with the concurrence of all parties, the result would be a tribunal of two, one Member of which would have two votes, and would practically have the case in his own hands. On the other hand, if, upon the absence of one Member, the Committee had to report to the House and take its pleasure, then upon the rising of the Committee the parties could not be told when the proceedings would be resumed, and the expenses of the inquiry would be going on, though no progress was being made. If the tribunal was to consist of four, the result would be almost worse, because one Member must then have two votes. He thought that with some of the new regulations and with others which might be introduced, the present odd number of five would give more satisfaction than any change such as was proposed.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that he had had an opportunity of hearing the Question discussed both at the Committee which had been held last year and at the Committee which had sat during the present Session, and he had come to the conclusion that the arguments were rather unfavourable to reducing the number so far as three. He believed that there was a good deal of force in the argument employed by the hon. Member for St. Ives, that in the case of the absence of one of the Members of a Committee formed of three, through illness, the whole business was practically under the control of the Chairman, who, in case of a division of opinion, would have the privilege of using his casting vote. Many of the matters referred to Select Committees were too important to be decided by one Member, and the public would hardly think that sufficient justice was done to their interests. If they could secure the attendance of three Members no doubt it would be sufficient, as that number was the present quorum. He would much prefer the reduction of the number of Members on the Committee to four. If he remembered rightly, his hon. Friend the Member for North Lancashire in the Committee which sat upon the subject last year advocated the reduction to that number, although as Chairman of the Committee which had recently sat he brought forward the recommendation for the reduction of the number to three.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he hoped that the House would not agree to the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, which would practically have the effect of placing the whole of the power in the hands of the Chairman, and reducing the other three Members to the position of dummies. He was quite willing to acknowledge that ability and intelligence possessed by the Chairmen of Committees, but he believed it would be very easy to find another half-dozen Gentlemen who would perform the duties of Chairmen equally well in every respect.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that he certainly had been in favour of four, but the feeling of the Committee was so strong against that number that he believed he stood almost alone. Under those circumstances, he felt himself bound to support the Report of the Committee.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought that the House hardly understood the proposition which had been made, because it involved not only an alteration in the number of Members serving on a Committee, but an alteration in the constitution of the Committee itself. At present the Committee was formed of five shifting Members, any three of whom formed a quorum, and the present proposal was that the Committees should consist of three Members, in the absence of any one of whom no business, unless the consent of the House had been obtained for such a course, could be proceeded with. The intention of the new Standing Order was that no one should vote who had not heard the evidence from beginning to the end.

The House divided:—Ayes 67; Noes 74: Majority 7.

Motion made, and Question proposed, that the word "five" be inserted, instead thereof.—(Mr. H. Baillie.)

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to move that the word "four" be inserted.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he wished to know, if it was competent to move an Amendment?

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he was in favour of four Members rather than of five, and should therefore vote against the insertion of the word five. He thought that the number of four would facilitate the conduct of private business.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he was also prepared to vote for "four." That number would afford some relief to the House and also leave an efficient Committee.

MR. SPEAKER said, he would put the Question in this form:—That the word "five" do stand part of the Resolution.

Captain Jervis

Those who were opposed to "five" might fill up the blank with any other number.

Question put, "That the word 'five' be inserted," instead thereof.

The House divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 87: Majority 32.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he moved that the word "four" be inserted, instead thereof.

Motion made, and Question proposed, that the word "four" be inserted, instead thereof.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he objected to the proposal, as he should prefer a Committee of three to four Members. In the former division the question was as between three and five, and he voted against three; but now he would, if it were competent to him to do so, move that the word "three" be inserted instead of four.

MR. PAULL said, he wished to ask, if it was competent for any hon. Member to move the insertion of the word "three" as an Amendment?

MR. SPEAKER said, it could not be done. The House had already decided against "three."

MR. PAULL said, that decision was "five" against "three." It was then proposed to take the decision of the House on the question of "three" against "four."

Motion made, and Question put, "That the word 'four' be inserted,"—(Colonel Wilson Patten.)—instead thereof.

The House divided:—Ayes 98; Noes 50: Majority 48.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that in consequence of the alteration just made he begged to move the postponement of Resolutions 7, 8, and 9, his object being to make them conformable to the Resolution already adopted.

Further Consideration of Standing Order, No. 7, postponed till To-morrow, at Six of the clock.

Standing Order No. 8, as amended by the Committee, and No. 9, as revised by the Committee, read as follows:—

"8. The Committee on every opposed Private Bill (not being a Railway, Canal, or Divorce Bill), or Group of Bills, shall be composed of a Chairman and two Members not locally or otherwise interested in the Bill or Bills referred to them, to be appointed by the Committee of Selection."

"9. The Committee on every unopposed Private Bill (not being a Railway, Canal, or Divorce Bill), shall, if the same shall have originated in this House, be composed of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who shall be ex officio Chairman of every such Committee, together with one of the Members ordered to prepare and bring in the Bill, and one other Member not locally or otherwise interested therein, such Members to be appointed by the Committee of Selection, and shall, if such Bill shall have been brought from the House of Lords, be composed of the Chairman as aforesaid, and two other Members, to be appointed by the Committee of Selection, of whom one at least shall not be locally or otherwise interested in the Bill; and the Chairman and one other Member of such Committee shall be the quorum thereof."

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to know how his hon. and gallant Friend intended to deal with the question of the Chairman's vote. There was a difficulty in the matter, as the Committees were to be composed of four Members. It would be objectionable to give one Member a double vote, and therefore he thought they ought to act on the maxim semper presumitur pro negante. The presumption was for the negative in appeal cases in the House of Lords and the Courts of Law, and he thought that would be the safest rule for the Committees of the House.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, his wish was to take the sense of the House on the Question, and therefore he would consider it afresh on the following day.

Motion made, "That the Consideration of Standing Orders No. 8 and No. 9 be postponed till to-morrow."

CAPTAIN JERVIS asked the Speaker, whether it would not be competent to any hon. Member to move on the following day that the word "three" be inserted in the Resolution instead of "four?"

MR. SPEAKER said, it would not. The sense of the House had been taken on the Question, "that the word 'three' stand part of the Question," and the decision had been in the negative. The only matters to be decided in connection with the Resolution were those of the quorum and the vote of the Chairman.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that believing that some time should be given for the consideration of the proposed changes, he would move the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he had never heard a more unreasonable proposition. The three Resolutions which he moved to postpone were connected with the one just adopted; but the others were in no way connected with those three.

MR. LYGON said, he would suggest that Resolutions 7, 8, and 9 should be postponed till the next Session.

MR. VANSITTART said, he should support the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Westminster.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, the House had distinctly decided the Question that four should be the number of members, and he was afraid that having so decided they could not go back on it. The Question of the casting vote of the Chairman was a very important one, and if Resolutions 7, 8, and 9 were postponed till the following Session, a new Standing Order might be framed, which, on a full and fair consideration of the subject, might meet all the difficulties.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he would have no objection to the suggestion of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Bouverie), but he did not see what was to be gained by it. At the beginning of next Session any hon. Member might move the repeal of the Resolution fixing the number at four.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he believed they had begun by repealing the Standing Orders, and, if so, they had no machinery for dealing with private business.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he thought it was not the fact that the Standing Orders had been repealed.

MR. SPEAKER said, he begged to remind the House that it had already decided that Standing Order No. 7 should be postponed till the following day. Then came Standing Orders 8 and 9, when it was proposed that they also should be postponed till to-morrow, on which the Question had been raised whether or not the whole debate should be adjourned. It was quite competent for any hon. Member to move that the debate be adjourned, otherwise the hon. and gallant Gentleman could go forward with the other Question which stood for consideration that evening.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he wished to ask, whether the Standing Orders had been repealed or not?

MR. SPEAKER said, it had been proposed to repeal the old Standing Orders and proceed to the consideration of the new, but a debate arose before that Question had been finally submitted to the House; and, therefore, the House had not come to any decision that the Standing Orders should be repealed.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it was necessary that they should now adjourn the debate, because they were now passing Resolutions which seemed to be inconsistent with the existing Standing Orders, and they would have two different sets of rules at the same time.

Further Consideration thereof, and of the Report of the Select Committee, postponed till To-morrow, at Six of the clock.

PARK LANE.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he wished to put a Question with reference to the enormous traffic which passes through Park Lane into Piccadilly. As the Metropolitan Board of Works had given in writing to the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works their opinion, that the best mode of facilitating that traffic would be the opening of Hamilton Place, and as the houses in that place were Crown property, he would beg to ask, Whether the right hon. Gentleman has considered the matter, and, if so, what course he, as representative of the Crown, intends to take in reference to it; whether he is prepared to assist the Metropolitan Board, they being responsible for compensation to the Crown tenants?

MR. COWPER said, he was glad to hear that the Metropolitan Board of Works had recognized the duty intrusted to them of preventing a serious public inconvenience and danger which at present existed, owing to the crowded state of Park Lane. He would willingly offer them every facility in his power to remedy so great an inconvenience. The Metropolitan Board of Works seemed to think that opening Hamilton Place would be a better course than widening Park Lane. He apprehended that there was considerable doubt upon that point. The upper portion of Hamilton Place was only twenty-eight feet wide in the carriage-way, which he considered was too small a width to meet the object in view. The land occupied by gardens northward was the property of the Crown, and was let upon lease to the tenants of the houses. Of course the Crown could not be advised to take any steps towards breaking the terms of those leases, which could only be done by an Act of Parliament. If, however, the Metropolitan Board of Works would bring forward a Bill to prolong Hamilton Place, no impediment would be offered on the part of the advisers of the Crown.

THE STANDARDS OF WEIGHT AND MEASURE.—QUESTION.

MR. DOULTON said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Exchequer Standards of Weight and Measure have been adjusted and reverified, in pursuance of an assurance given by the Secretary of State for the Home Department on the 29th of July, 1862, to the effect, "that measures had already been taken for the accomplishment of that object;" whether the Standards recently taken out of the wall of Parliament have been compared with those at the Exchequer; and, if so, whether any and what discrepancy was found to exist; and whether any Report has been received from the Astronomer Royal, as chairman of the Standard Committee, relative to such comparison?

Sir George Grey

MR. PEEL said, in reply, that early in the present year the Treasury asked the surviving members—seven or eight in number—of the National Standard Commission, to examine the original Standards of Weights and Measures, and the Astronomer Royal had made a Report, in which he said—

"The Controller General of the Exchequer produced for the inspection of the members the National or Parliamentary Standard of Length (duly identified by its distinguishing marks as described in the Standard Act), which was examined by all the members present with the aid of powerful microscopes, and was judged by all to be in so perfect a state that no comparison with the Parliamentary copies was necessary."

As regarded the Standard of Weight, Professor Airy said—

"The three Parliamentary copies of the Weight Standard were collected on March the 14th; and, on March the 15th, Professor W. H. Miller recompared the Parliamentary Standard of Weight with them under favourable circumstances. The apparent change of weight of the Parliamentary Standard was less than 1-5,000,000th of the whole—a quantity within errors of observation, and implying no real change."

As regarded the copies of the Exchequer Standards deposited in the wall of the recess in the Lower Waiting Room of Westminster Palace, he says—

"In the presence of the Committee, the leaden box of the immured Standards was opened, and the Parliamentary copy of the Standard of Length was examined with Mr. Simm's microscopes, and that of Weight by general inspection. Both were in the finest possible order."

NAVY—GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is the intention of the Lords Commissioners to appropriate any portion of Greenwich Hospital for the reception of worn-out and disabled Seamen of the Merchant Service?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply, that it was not the intention of the Admiralty to appropriate any portion of Greenwich Hospital to that purpose.

PAY AND CLOTHING OF THE POLICE.

QUESTION.

MR. HOWES said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown has been given on the construction of the Act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 69, s. 16, respecting certain deductions made by the Treasury from the Government contribution of one-fourth part of the charge for the pay and clothing of the Police in Counties and Boroughs, and whether he will state the effect of such opinion?

MR. PEEL said, in reply, that the Law Officers of the Crown had given it as their opinion that the expression, "charge for pay," would include any portion of the pay deducted for the purpose of being paid over to the superannuation fund. The Treasury, therefore, were at liberty to contribute one-fourth part of the charge for pay inclusive of the sum paid for superannuation.

PASSPORTS IN FRANCE.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the exemption of British Subjects from the demand for Passports in France exempts them also from their Passports being demanded and given over to the custody of the captain on going on board French Passenger Steamers in the Mediterranean and elsewhere? He wished further to ask, Whether any information has been received at the Foreign Office of the complaint made by Lord Francis Douglas, that his Passport had been taken from him and torn to pieces before his face at a place near Bodenbach, in Austria?

MR. LAYARD replied, that he had not received any official communication on the subject of Lord Francis Douglas's passport. With regard to the more general Question, he had to state that, as far as he could ascertain, the rule appeared to be that when a French passenger vessel called at any port in the Mediterranean, it was the practice for the captain to collect the passports and show them to the authorities. But he was not aware whether the captain did that in the case of vessels trading between one French port and another. He rather thought that was not the practice.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE — BRITISH KAFFRARIA.—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will lay upon the table of the House the recent Despatches from the Governor of the Cape Colony relating to the proposed annexation of the Trans-Kei territory to British Kaffraria? He also wished to ask, Whether the recent Despatches received from the Cape of Good Hope have led the right hon. Gentleman to think that there is any chance of another Kaffir war; and, if so, whether in the event of such misfortune the whole cost will have to be borne by the Imperial Exchequer, or whether any portion of the cost beyond the payment of the Mounted Police will be required from the Colony?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, it was difficult to state the provision for a future war. As he had stated the other evening, the result of the despatches was upon the whole satisfactory. With respect to the details of those despatches which related to the state of feeling on the frontier, he thought it would not be desirable to produce them.

UNITED STATES—THE CIVIL WAR.

QUESTION.

MR. LINDSAY said, before putting the Question of which he had given notice, he had desired to have made a statement, containing some important facts bearing upon the American war, and tending to show how futile was the attempt to restore the Union and to coerce the South; but as he had no opportunity now of doing so, he begged simply to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If, considering the great sacrifice of life and property occasioned by the war still raging between the United States of America and the Confederate States, and considering the loss the people of this Country have suffered by the war, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, in concert with the other Powers of Europe, to use their endeavours to bring about a suspension of hostilities?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I can assure my hon. Friend that Her Majesty's Government deeply lament the great sac-rice of life and property in America and the distress which that war has produced in this country. But we have not thought that in the present state of things there was any advantage to be gained by entering into concert with any other Powers for the purpose of proposing or offering mediation, or of negotiating with the Government of the United States or of the Confederate States to bring about a termination of this unhappy war.

ORDER OF ST. MICHAEL AND ST.
GEORGE.—QUESTION.

LORD ERNEST BRUCE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Ministers to advise Her Majesty, in consequence of the cession of the Ionian Islands to the kingdom of Greece, to enlarge the statutes of the most distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George, so as to enable Her Majesty to confer that Order upon such persons as She may think proper, who have served Her Majesty in any part of Her Colonial Possessions?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that it was true that, since the cession of the Ionian Islands, the Order had become confined to Malta. The subject of its extension was well worthy of consideration, but Her Majesty's pleasure had not yet been signified.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE—THE KAFFIR WAR.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: I wish, Sir, to ask a Question of the Secretary of State for the Colonies in consequence of the reply he has just given the hon. Member for Taunton. I do not understand how the expenses of a Kaffir war are to be shared in the unfortunate mischance of such an event. I hope the right hon. Gentleman has formed a distinct conception in his own mind upon this subject, and I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will console the House by assuring them that in the event of such a calamity as that referred to there will be a limit to our share of the consequent expense.

MR. CARDWELL said, he wished—but unfortunately it was not in his power—to state beforehand what the expenses of any future war would be. He had already stated that there was no arrangement between this country and the colony as to the expense of any Kaffir war. British

Kaffraria, as the noble Lord was doubtless aware, was no longer part of the Cape Colony.

ARMY—STAMP DUTY ON COMMISSIONS.
QUESTION.

LORD HOTHAM said, he rose to ask, on behalf of his right hon. and gallant Friend General Peel, Whether it is true that a demand has recently been made upon an Officer for Stamp Duty upon a Commission as Quartermaster General in the Crimea in 1855, which appointment he ceased to hold in 1856; and whether, in fact, any Commission has ever been made out?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON replied, that a Circular had been issued in December, 1858, which laid it down that a stamp duty of thirty shillings should be paid on commissions being gazetted. According to that rule, this stamp duty ought to be collected out of the first additional pay received by the officer. It appeared that in some cases this had been neglected to be done, and therefore it was very probable that in some instances officers might have been recently asked to pay the stamp duty on commissions granted so long ago. With regard to the great delay in making these claims on officers, the noble Lord was probably aware that in consequence of the enormous number of new commissions issued a few years ago, an Act was passed dispensing with the necessity of the Sign Manual being affixed to them, the signature of the Commander-in-Chief being substituted. The arrear was so great it had not been all worked off yet; and, inasmuch as the Commissioners of Inland Revenue actually refused to affix the stamp to commissions till the stamp duty was paid, the charge was now being made against those officers who ought to have paid it at once.

CASE OF MR. O'MALLEY IRWIN.
QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to ask a Question of the Secretary for Ireland with reference to a Parliamentary Paper which was laid on the table on the 29th of June. The paper in question was one of four letters written thirty years ago relative to a charge of forgery against Mr. O'Malley Irwin, and which had hitherto been withheld from the House. It appears that a copy has been found by Sir Thomas Larcom in the Irish Office, and it was produced when moved for by the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) in the course of the late debate. On Friday night a doubt was cast on the authenticity of this Letter by the Irish Attorney General. He (Mr. Hennessy) wished to know, Whether there is a Copy of that Letter in the Chief Secretary's Office, and whether the original has been abstracted from the Crown Solicitor's Papers during the trial of Mr. Irwin for forgery in 1834, and also whether this Copy is authentic?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he believed he might state that if the letter dated the 4th October was a copy of an original, its authenticity might be asserted. Thirty years ago was rather a long time to carry inquiries back, and to speak with accuracy on such a matter.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, a correspondence had passed between Sir Thomas Larcom and himself on this subject, and he distinctly stated that the original letter was not in the Office. He was not prepared to say this was a copy of an original letter.

MR. HENNESSY said, reverting to the subject of his Question, he wished to know, Who is responsible for the Note appended to the Return, as to the Original Letter having been abstracted from the Crown Solicitor's papers, and whether the statement made in that Note is correct?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, of course the Irish Office was responsible. He was responsible for it to that House.

ARMY.

THE ARMSTRONG GUN FACTORY AT WOOLWICH.—QUESTION.

In reply to a Question from Mr. W. MONSELL,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was not aware of the existence of any papers which would corroborate the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman on the subject of the Woolwich Gun Foundry the other night; but he had received private information upon that point, from which he had reason to believe that that statement was perfectly correct. He believed that the whole building, which was constructed at the time when the right hon. Gentleman was in office, with some trifling exceptions, was available for the manufacture of the Armstrong gun. The only loss was occasioned by the additional expense for the fitting boxes, amounting to £2,700, and for the casting-pit, amounting to £4,000, making together £6,700. From this the sum of £836 must be deducted for the sale of old iron, leaving a sum of £5,864 actually lost by the change of machinery from cast iron to Armstrong ordnance.

FORTIFICATIONS (PROVISION FOR EXPENSES) BILL.—[BILL 218.]

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE observed that, in popular theory, the House of Commons was responsible for the keeping of the public purse. That was a delusion which was fast passing away; for what was the state of the representative system in the month of July? After two and a half hours' discussion on the Standing Orders, which came to nothing, they were exhausted, and were prepared to pass a Bill involving millions of money. What was really the state of the question regarding fortifications? At half past two in the morning during the last week the Bill went into Committee; that was to say at a time when it was impossible for those who were not present to know what had been done, for those able men who sat in the Reporters' Gallery were naturally as much fatigued as the House, and they were totally unable to record any remarks if they were made; the consequence was a blank in the discussions of the question, which involved first and last an expenditure of £20,000,000. How did the question actually stand at that moment? A material alteration had been made in the original plan for the defence of Portsmouth Harbour and Spithead, which he believed would not be effectual for its purpose, but would lead to a great increase of expenditure. The original plan, as given by the Defence Commissioners three years ago, proposed to flank the entrance to Spithead with two forts on the Horse Shoe and No Man's shoals. The House approved and adopted that plan. That was the outer circle of defence 6,000 yards from Portsmouth Dockyard. But within that outer defence the Commissioners proposed that midway between Ryde and Portsmouth another fort should be erected called Sturbridge, to command the anchorage at Spithead. From the Report of the Commissioners it appeared that was a most material point in the inner circle of defence. What, then, had been done? Mr. Hawkshaw, the engineer at that time, made a Report in which he stated he was very much afraid he would not find a foundation sufficient to carry the heavy guns intended for that fort. At the time Mr. Hawkshaw had already penetrated 30 feet, and he stated that if he went 15 feet further without finding any solid foundation he would have to give up the work. That depth was reached without the discovery of any solid foundation, and the consequence was that after the House had been misled and a large sum of money expended, Sturbridge Fort was abandoned. By the abandonment of that fort he maintained that the recommendation of the Defence Commissioners, as indorsed by Parliament, had been materially altered, for the result was that an enemy would be able to steam up a channel 2,000 yards in width and shell the dockyards with comparative freedom from molestation. The Defence Committee, with the addition of another officer, Sir Alexander Milne, after the want of success at Sturbridge in finding a solid foundation, were called upon for another Report, and he could not, when he considered the amount of money involved, avoid characterizing the haste which the matter had been dealt with as most extraordinary, if not indecent. The Committee were only called upon to report on the 15th of July, and on the 19th the Report was presented. No explanation was given with it. They had only that morning received the plan which should have accompanied the Report involving the alteration of the whole of our national defences, and which, if agreed to, would burden the country with a positive expense of £11,000,000, according to the estimates, and they were asked that evening to consent to the third reading of the Bill, which would give a Parliamentary sanction to the new plan. He believed the House was blind enough to pass anything, and the excuse they would urge would probably be that they shuffled off all the responsibility upon the Ministry. What did that responsibility amount to? The House voted the money, and its application might be found some years hence to have been of no service at all; and that was where the responsibility, as it was termed, began and ended. Three years ago they were told it was of vital importance that the country should be put into a state of defence, but what was the actual result? The result was that on shore they had enormous lines of trenches and

casemates with neither men nor guns to defend them, while they were so much the weaker by the increased area which they had to defend; and at sea not a single floating battery had been made for the last three years. But the state of the gunnery was a question of still greater importance. The expiring moments of Parliament could not be better devoted than to the consideration of the state of the weapons which were placed in the defences, and by which the integrity of the country was to be preserved. He found that in the last five years, between 1858 and 1863, the country had expended £2,539,547 17s. 8d. upon the construction of new ordnance, and that the result had been an issue to the army and navy of 2,370 guns, of which number 799 were the 100-pounders, and to the efficiency of those guns he would allude. No doubt we possessed some excellent iron-clad ships, but had the Admiralty any guns fit to put into them? He held in his hand a most extraordinary pamphlet by a flag officer of great reputation on the active list, Admiral Halstead, in which that officer stated his opinion that "the British navy at present possesses no guns adapted for iron-plate warfare." The Duke of Somerset, too, on being asked by the Ordnance Committee as to his opinion of the 100-pounder, said that for naval purposes at 200 yards it certainly had not the greatest power for penetration, and that in that respect the old 68-pounder smooth-bore was the most effective weapon in the service. The Report of the Committee, after a review of the whole subject, was to the same effect, that the 100-pounders were of no service. The fact was that we had consumed two and a half millions of money during the last five years, and that we were as far from having an effectual naval weapon as we were at the outset. If the House thought that that was a subject with which it was entitled to meddle, it ought not to consent to the third reading of the Bill without having some more definite idea as to the future than was to be gathered from the Reports laid before Parliament. He wished to do full justice to Sir William Armstrong, and he must say that he could not think that he had been particularly successful in his large guns, but at the same time justice had not been done to him. They should remember that, as Mr. Armstrong in 1859, he never undertook to make any large guns; he only undertook to contract for the supply of light breech-loading field guns to the army. It was very true that a most extraordinary contract was entered into, but the House should remember the original circumstances. At the same time, subsequent experience and experiments had shown that the breech-loading system as applied to heavy guns was a complete failure, and at that moment Government was occupied in doing with their artillery exactly the reverse of what they were doing with the small arms. At that time 250 breech-loaders were being rifled upon the shunt principle, which was, in reality, nothing more nor less than an adaptation by Sir William Armstrong of the French principle, with a slight alteration. The House would easily understand the principle, which was the insertion into the gun of a projectile with ribs or buttons, but the material difference was that the shot entering by one chamber was discharged by another set of grooves. Complaints had been made, and most justly, of the great partiality exhibited by the Select Ordnance Committee with reference to Sir William Armstrong. Nothing appeared to go down with the Committee but Armstrong guns. Every inventor who had come before the Committee complained of the conduct of its members in that respect. On comparing our Select Ordnance Committee with a similar committee in France, he could not help arriving at the conclusion that its members had done wonderfully little in contributing to the service of gunnery. It was a most remarkable fact that with the one exception of Captain Blakeley, all the improvements in gunnery had been effected by civilians. Mr. Whitworth, Mr. Lynam Thomas, and Sir William Armstrong were all civilians, and Captain Blakeley was the only artilleryman connected with the improvements. The House, perhaps, imagined, that these 110-pounder guns were tested by experiment before being adopted. No such thing. Sir William Armstrong was made a director of the Artillery; and when he was asked before the Committee to state upon what series of experiments these guns were approved, his answer was, "None at all. There was such a pressure that there was no time for experiments." Yet a great number of guns had been made which were utterly condemned in the navy, and he believed that no great confidence was felt in them by the practical men of the Royal Artillery. He now wished to draw attention to a comparison between the French gun and ours, because really we seemed to be in a sort of fool's paradise with regard to our gun, which was thought an invention superior to any in all the world. He was sorry to see that the Duke of Somerset ridiculed altogether the idea of the French gun, though his Grace gave no reasons; but a remarkable paper had lately appeared in the Edinburgh Review, evidently written by an artilleryman of high standing, in which a very favourable account was given of this French gun, which, as compared with our 68-pounder, —the only one available for the armament of our iron-clads— was said to be as superior as cheese to chalk. Had the noble Lord (Lord Clarence Paget), above all men in the world—he who was such a great naval reformer in opposition, and who discovered then a waste of £5,000,000 which he had never proved—had that great naval reformer who had reformed nothing, sanctioned an expenditure of £2,500,000 upon a gun, while the navy was left without any except what was called the good and wholesome old 68-pounder? Captain Blakeley, who was an artillery officer of great attainments, and was driving an enormous trade in guns with foreign countries, where his guns were highly approved, was asked before the Committee whether he thought that the Armstrong gun would be effective against a side of La Gloire. His answer, in effect, was, "By no means. The French possess a gun so superior to the Armstrong, that if we unfortunately went to war with them at the present time our iron-clads would not stand a chance against that gun." Captain Blakeley went on to say that we had spent millions upon the formation of an iron-clad fleet, and if we sent the fleet to sea at the present moment it would cut a very sorry figure against the French gun. Was that a proper state of things? Could the House be content to go to what were called its duties in the country, not knowing at any time, if a war broke out, what would be the result? He could not rest content without making a last struggle to draw attention to the subject. As to the forts, he doubted whether there was a gun for them; and, after all, recent experience had not been such as to afford much encouragement with regard to heavy guns. At the siege of Charleston, where these monster guns had been employed, they had never fired above forty-eight rounds without bursting, though to that day Fort Sumter had never been taken; and an American paper took much credit for a heavy gun which was fired seventy-six times and did not burst till the seventy-seventh. Expensive experiments were going on at Shoeburyness, which, as the writer in the Edinburgh Review said, were made without precision and without judgment, and yet we now had no naval gun, while it was very much doubted whether we had a gun which was fit to be mounted in the forts when they were built. From the first he had always argued that the proper defence of our shores was the navy, and the navy alone. But although the House supported him by their cheers, they had withheld their votes from him. These fortifications had lingered, the original plan being altered, while it might be altered again. If it were not for the lateness of the Session he should be almost inclined to resist the third reading, to stop the digging of holes in which we were burying millions, and ask the House to pause in the rash outlay, and see whether they could not lay out the residue of the money to better advantage upon naval defences. Exhausted as the House was, he felt indebted to them for listening to his short explanation, but he felt the question to be one of such vital importance that it could not be pool-pooched from the Treasury Bench, and was worthy the deepest consideration of the House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was very glad that the hon. Gentleman had not carried out his intention of opposing the third reading of the Bill, especially as it had reference to the completion of a scheme for the defence of Portsmouth and Spithead. The subject had been so fully discussed in several former years, and the House had so distinctly asserted its determination that Spithead should be defended by a system of forts in combination with its floating defences, that it would be scarcely worth while to occupy time at that late period of the Session in discussing once again the merits of the scheme. It was true that it had been found necessary to abandon the site of one of these forts, and a modification of the plan had been rendered necessary, but that modification was very slight. But if the hon. Gentleman would look at the evidence before the Defence Commission, he would see that the Government had sufficient grounds to go upon with regard to the foundation for the Sturbridge Fort. Sir Charles Fox strongly supported the opinion that a site would be found; and although Mr. Hawkshaw expressed more doubt, still his evidence pointed rather to the probability of very great outlay being necessary than to the conclusion that a good and safe foundation would not be found. The hon. Member accused the Government of not having made greater progress with the works. But the House would remember that it was owing to the opposition of the hon. Member that the whole scheme for the defence of Spithead was suspended for more than a year, and that not only the work was suspended, but a great deal had to be gone over again. If, then, anybody was to be responsible for the delay in building the forts, and for the fact that the foundations were not yet above the level of the water, it was the hon. Member himself and the House. The hon. Member complained that the scheme had been presented in too hurried a manner. Now, the Report was presented the day before that fixed for the Committee on the Bill, and although the explanatory plan was not ready on the same day, the plan was conspicuously displayed in the House early that morning, and was tolerably certain to be seen by hon. Members who came down prepared to discuss the Bill. Hon. Members had not been asked to read a long and complicated Report; the Report presented was a very short one, and he did not know what possible benefit could have resulted from its being placed in the hands of Members at an earlier period. With regard to the plan, the object was that if the enemy's ships should succeed in penetrating the outer line of defences, they should be exposed at any spot where they might anchor to bombard the dockyard at Portsmouth to so concentrated a fire from the several forts that they would be unable to devote themselves to that object. By the Report of the Committee, without referring to the plan, it would be seen that those four works averaged about 3,000 yards' distance from each other, the greatest distance being a little over 4,000 yards. The experiments which had taken place a few days ago at Shoeburyness showed that the expectations of the Committee with respect to the ordnance which might be placed in our forts had been fulfilled to the letter. The experiments made on that occasion showed that at 3,000 yards a projectile fired from the 600-pounder gun with a full charge would break the plates of any iron-clad vessel. [Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE: What! At 3,000 yards?] The experiments which had been fully reported in The Times showed that to be the fact. No ship could possibly pass between the forts at a greater distance than 1,500 yards from one of them ; and no ship could take up a position to shell the dockyard at a greater distance than 2,000 yards from the combined power of the forts. The hon. Gentleman said we had not a gun to put in these forts ; but the House would perceive that the experiments with the 600-pounders showed that when mounted on the forts those guns would do all that they had originally been expected to do. Though he quite admitted we were not as far advanced in the matter of ordnance as might be wished, still there was no reason that when those forts were finished they should not be armed with a certain proportion of 600-pounders, and a proportion of smaller guns. The foundation of the forts would not be ready till next summer, and another year or two must elapse before the structures would be ready to receive the guns. Surely, then, the hon. Member would not have had the Government manufacture more of these 600-pounder guns without instituting experiments to test their performance. In reference to what had been said by the hon. Gentleman on the subject of breech-loading guns, he was quite free to admit that, as explained by him, the breech-loading system of Sir William Armstrong, which had proved so successful in the case of smaller ordnance—of field guns—had not been found so successful in guns of a larger description. [Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE : Hear, hear !] But the hon. Member had mentioned that the Government were altering some of the old breech-loaders into muzzle-loaders. That statement was not strictly accurate. No finished breech-loaders had been altered. Certainly 250 guns which it had been intended to finish as breech-loaders had since been ordered to be finished as muzzle-loaders. The barrels had been formed, but they were in the state in which it was possible to finish them on the muzzle-loading system or as breech-loading guns ; and considering that the system of breech-loading guns had not been found to answer satisfactorily, orders were given to finish them as muzzle-loaders. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the Duke of Somerset's evidence before the Ordnance Committee of the previous year, in which his Grace said that at 200 yards the 110 lb. gun was not effective against iron-plates ; but the House must recollect that when that gun was ordered it was not intended to be used against iron-plates. There had been an opinion prevalent in the country that our ships should be armed with a rifle gun, throwing a ball a long distance. Accordingly those guns were ordered, and except with the few exceptions of their trials against iron-plates, they had been found to answer exceedingly well. The hon. Gentleman said that those were important exceptions. [Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE : Hear !] But he must repeat it had not been intended that those guns should be used against iron-plates, and there were a great many situations in which they could be exceedingly useful. The Duke of Somerset had given his opinion that the navy had not got too many of them. For all purposes of long range, and for use against wooden ships, those guns were most desirable ; and unquestionably they would be most valuable on shores which were not exposed to the attacks of iron-clad ships. They could not be adopted as the staple arm of our ships ; but both naval and military authorities concurred in thinking that too many of them had not been made. The hon. Gentleman said that we had not got anything better than the old 68-pounders against iron-clad ships. [Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE : The Duke of Somerset said it.] The Duke of Somerset made that statement last year ; but since that a number of guns from 6½ to 7 tons weight had been made—that being, as we were told, the heaviest weight of broadside gun which a ship could carry. If heavier guns were put aboard, it must be to be used as other than broadside guns. The Government were also making some of the 12-ton guns, which, when smooth bore, had a calibre of 10½ inches, and when rifled a calibre of 9·22 inches. It might be said that they had not got any large number of those guns. They certainly had not ; but surely the hon. Gentleman did not think the Government were wrong in making experiments before they introduced either the 7-ton or the 12-ton gun as a general arm of the navy. They had gone on with such haste in the case of the 110-pounder that no experiments had preceded its adoption ; but the result taught them that they might go too fast, and those large guns which were being tried were very expensive. Next Session, if the House thought fit to vote the necessary sums, the Government would be prepared to go on faster in producing those large wrought-iron guns for the army and navy. He could assure the House that the hon. Gentleman was mistaken when he said that the French navy was better armed than ours. If the hon. Member was right, would he tell the House what this formidable weapon was which the French service possessed? [Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE: Read the article in the Edinburgh Review.] He had read it. The hon. Gentleman said that evidently it was written by a man possessing very great knowledge of the subject. He thought it quite evident that it was written by a person who was very friendly to the inventor of the gun to which he presumed the hon. Member referred. That gun was a weapon of great range, power, and accuracy, but it was a mistake to suppose that the French navy was armed with that experimental gun. He believed the French ships were armed with old 32-pounder guns which had been rifled, and which did not carry a charge of more than 8 lb. or 9 lb. of powder. If it was a fact that any other nation was very much ahead of us in its ordnance, that would be an argument to show that we should proceed to manufacture a large number of the best gun we had; but as that was not the case, there was no such necessity for such hot haste. If there was reason to believe that we could arm our ships with as good a gun as any other nation could bring against us, and that we could construct improved guns as fast as anybody else, that was a reason, not, perhaps, for delay, but for not proceeding with undue haste. The hon. Member said that recent experience seemed to be against large guns, and he referred to the short lives of the American guns at Charleston. The fact was that the Americans did not possess a wrought-iron gun at all, and experience had shown that cast-iron, however well made, was not suitable for large guns carrying a heavy charge of powder. Wrought-iron or steel was the proper material for the purpose; and although it might be more expensive in the first instance, yet as it lasted much longer than cast-iron, there was in the end not much difference in respect of cost. Therefore, he did not think we were in so deplorable a condition in regard to the armament of our ships as the hon. Member wished the House to believe. Heavier guns were being made, and he hoped that before long we should have a number of iron-clad ships armed with a gun much superior to the 68-pounder. As to the forts which would be exposed to attack by iron-clad vessels, an armament would be prepared for them before they could possibly be finished. In the course they had pursued, the Government had been carrying out the wishes of the House, and he thought that at so late a date, it would be a pity to stop the works then going on and resort to another mode of defence.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he regretted that, in attacking the Government for not paying proper attention to the defences of the country, the hon. Member for Liskeard should have cast reflections on a body of officers who deserved well of their country—the Ordnance Select Committee. [Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE disclaimed any intention of doing so.] The hon. Gentleman had accused the Committee of being prejudiced in favour of one system, which had disappointed everybody. The truth was that since the subject began to attract attention the Committee had been changed three or four times in order to please the hon. Gentleman and others. First of all it was composed of artillery officers, but a complaint was made that it was not purely an artillery question, and that engineering science should be brought to bear on it. Accordingly, engineer officers were put on the Committee; but even that did not satisfy people, and a mixed Committee was formed, comprising officers of artillery, engineers, and civilians, among the number being such men as Professor Wheatstone and Mr. Gregory. Objections, however, continued to be made, and further changes took place. The Committee now included artillery officers, engineer officers, line officers, and naval officers. Surely, when such a body of men, consisting of the best officers in the service and eminent engineers, concurred in a certain opinion, even the hon. Gentleman might be expected to bow to it. Great improvements had been effected during the last six years. In 1858, when the gallant General the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) was at the War Office, there was a great cry for a rifled gun, and every effort was made to procure the best. Sir William, then Mr. Armstrong, a man quite unknown at that time, came forward with a plan, and after a long course of experiments he was pronounced to be the victor, and his gun was adopted. Indeed, such was the enthusiasm that the House and the country believed this inventor knew more about rifled guns than anybody else, artillery officers being quite ignorant on the subject ; and so he was appointed Director of the Rifled Ordnance Factory.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE : The House did not make the appointment.

CAPTAIN JERVIS : No ; but when it was announced in the House that Mr. Armstrong was to be Director and K.C.B., and all the rest of it, the intimation was received with plaudits. Well, Sir William Armstrong having gained a high position, was naturally attacked by a number of men who tried to grapple with him and to take his place. Then came the question of a possible collision with France, and an alarm was raised that we had no naval guns. He recollected the Secretary to the Admiralty refusing to give Returns of naval guns, because we had then none at all. Sir William Armstrong succeeded in introducing 40 and 70-pounder guns which could blow any wooden ship out of the water. The French and other Governments finding that such powerful ordnance could be constructed, turned their attention to iron-plated ships ; and as they went on from two, four, and six inches of iron, Sir William Armstrong kept up to them. We had now a gun which could pierce a ship plated with any thickness of iron that, as far as experiments had gone, could probably be used. It was for the Government to decide how many of these guns should be ordered ; but hon. Members should not go on blowing hot and cold as they were doing. At one time they complained that the Government had done nothing, and then that they had done too much. Where should we have been, he would like to know, but for the money which had been spent ? If the 100-pounder had been given up, it was because something better had been found. We had proceeded on step by step from one gun to another. It was only within the last few years that the great manufacturers had learnt how to make iron-plates at all. He recollected a year or two back when a $\frac{3}{4}$ -inch plate was deemed quite a wonder ; and it was much to have found out in so short a time how to roll such enormous plates as were now produced. It was not a mere military question, but one which interested every man who worked in iron, whether master or mechanic ; and he was not sure that as much credit was not due to the labourers at the furnaces as to anybody else. He trusted that the House would discuss the question without any party feeling, and that when it was found that we had got a good weapon, the Government would stick to it and carry it out.

Bill read 3^o and passed.

[BILL 213] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time." — (Viscount Palmerston.)

MR. HENNESSY said, he had opposed the Bill at every stage, and it was rather singular that the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the measure was never in his place when the Order was called. He was always out of the House when the discussion commenced. On a former occasion he ventured to say it was irregular that an opposed Bill should be moved by any one except the Minister in charge of it ; and he begged leave to ask the opinion of the Speaker on that point.

MR. SPEAKER said, the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench were responsible for such Bills.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE : It is an Order of the House.

MR. HENNESSY said, that petitions had been addressed to the House by medical officers in Her Majesty's Indian service, complaining that the Indian Government were treating them very badly. Only a few days ago a petition was laid on the table from the College of Surgeons, reciting the grievances of these gentlemen, the gist of the statement being that changes had been introduced by the Government to the disadvantage of medical officers belonging, not only to the Indian, but also to the Home service. Under these circumstances the number of candidates for medical appointments had declined in proportion as the Government injured the service. In 1858 an Act was passed providing that all medical appointments in India should be given by open competition. The Secretary of State alleged that open competition had failed, because the number of candidates had fallen off more and more every year ; but that result was attributable not to the failure of competition, but to the ill-treatment of the service. The right hon. Gentleman, instead of redressing the grievances of the medical men, proposed to do away with open competition and to appoint an efficient body of medical officers, thus endangering the safety of the Indian army. The Bill had been brought in late in the Session, and hurried through to its last stage without opportunity being given for discussion in anything like a complete House. It proposed, in lieu of the present statutory regulation under which the appointments were made, to place the old and arbitrary power of selection in the hands of the Secretary of State. The right hon. Gentleman said he intended to obtain medical men for India from the Queen's army; but the army of the Queen itself was at that moment inadequately supplied with medical men. The right hon. Gentleman asked them to repeal the only statute which established open competition, and then he said he would avail himself of a warrant by which such competition was established. But that warrant might at any moment be withdrawn, and, moreover, the provisions of the Bill made no mention of it whatever. He begged, therefore, to move that the Speaker leave the Chair, in order that in Committee he might move the insertion of words which might make the Bill a useful measure.

COLONEL NORTH said, he would second the Motion. The Queen's army, from which it was proposed to draw medical men for India, was most insufficiently provided with medical officers. If there was an army in the world which had a right to expect that no expense would be spared in supplying it with a proper medical staff, it was the British army. Some foreign armies might be more exposed to the bullet, but no army was so much exposed to every kind of climate. It seemed to be utterly impossible to make any impression on the Government on that subject. Even the disastrous experience of the Crimean war, in which thousands and thousands of men were sacrificed in consequence of the inadequacy of the medical staff, appeared to have been lost upon the Government. The medical service of the army was composed of a body of gentlemen who had never failed in their duty at home or abroad; but, owing to the treatment these gentlemen received, medical men of good standing could no longer be got to enter the service, and the Government were obliged to resort to the introduction of an inferior class of men. He protested on the part of the army against the manner in which the medical department had been treated, and unless something were done in the interval he would move an address to the Crown on the subject early next Session.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "That the," to the end of the

Mr. Hennessy

Question, in order to add the words "said Order be discharged,"—(Mr. Hennessy),—instead thereof.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Baronet meant to do away with open competition. The refusal to answer that question created suspicion. He had reason to believe that the competitive system had succeeded well, and he made the statement on the authority of an Indian medical officer. Several petitions, however, had been sent up to him that day for presentation to that House, protesting that the Warrant of 1858 had not been carried out. As things stood young men were deterred from entering the medical service; but, if an alteration were made, the services of a highly educated body of men would be rendered available and their rights secured. As to drawing assistant-surgeons from the Queen's army, they were told the other night that for the last eighteen months the supply of that body had fallen short by forty men. There must be something radically wrong in the system, either with reference to the position or the pay of these officers, for if they gave men sufficient encouragement to enter, there would be no difficulty in obtaining a proper supply.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the hon. Member who spoke last had mixed up matters which bore no relation to each other. He had said he had several petitions to present from medical officers in India with reference to the Warrant of 1858, but he had entirely forgotten that there lay on the table the copy of a despatch sent to India three or four months ago, and remedying the grievances of the existing medical service of India by putting it entirely on the same footing as to pay and allowances as the Queen's army occupied, according to the rank which the officers held. The hon. Member said the object of the Bill was to get rid of the competitive system, and to introduce into the Indian service an inferior class of medical officers. The hon. Gentleman must either not have heard or had forgotten the statements that he (Sir Charles Wood) had made on three or four occasions in that House. The competitive system had not failed in the Queen's army at home, but it had failed in respect to the Indian army. That was, of course, before the improvements had been made in the condition of the medical officers in that country. The object was to get a better description of men for the Indian service. All the assistant-surgeons entered the Queen's army by competition. It was not possible to introduce into the Bill all the regulations that would be necessary to be made, but those regulations would be laid before Parliament. The object of the Bill was to enable the Secretary of State to make certain regulations under which assistant-surgeons of the Indian army might be induced to enter the Indian army, and he believed that the advantages of Indian service were so great that many officers would be induced to avail themselves of the opportunity held out to them. There could be no object in requiring two examinations in such cases. The assistant-surgeon passed a competitive examination upon entering the Queen's army, and it would be useless to call upon him to undergo a second and similar examination upon transferring himself to the Indian service. There were also good medical schools in India from which men might also be drawn. After these explanations, he trusted the House would assent to the third reading of the Bill.

MR. MONSELL said, that having listened attentively to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he still entertained a belief that the object of the Bill was to get rid of a system which had been deliberately adopted by Parliament—the system of competition in the Indian medical service, and to substitute for it the arbitrary will of the Secretary of State. That was not an object which the House should sanction. It was said that there was a difficulty in getting medical officers for the Indian service, and the right hon. Gentleman told them that he was not going to get a worse class of officers than we had at present there. If so, there was no reason to depart from the present system. Let the right hon. Gentleman hold out proper temptations, and there would be a hundred candidates for each appointment. Either there was no reason for the Bill or the standard of efficiency was to be lowered. If, as the right hon. Gentleman assured them, he had introduced many important improvements in the condition of the Indian medical service, there would be a sufficient number of candidates at the next competitive examination. It was a mere question of demand and supply. If terms were proposed such as men of education could not accept, the right hon. Gentleman would not get a sufficient number of proper candidates. The right hon. Gentleman said he wanted to get assistant-surgeons from the Queen's army to enter the Indian service; but then they were told by the hon. and gallant Officer opposite that there was a difficulty in obtaining a sufficient number of assistant-surgeons for the Queen's army. The proposition had filled him with alarm, because he knew that there lurked in many departments a dislike to the whole system of competition. He believed that if the Bill were carried, although he was quite sure the right hon. Gentleman would not depart from his promises, yet in the course of a short time the competitive system would be destroyed root and branch. He implored the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw the Bill, and not to endeavour in the last days of the Session, by means of a Government majority, to pass a measure which could not be fairly discussed, and which appeared to be so opposed to a system which had received the sanction of Parliament.

MR. LYSLEY said, he rose to join in the appeal. The provisions of the Bill appeared to him to be clear to substitute a system of patronage for a system of competition. He protested against a Bill which professed upon its face to confer unlimited powers being explained by a promise that those powers should only be exercised within a certain limit. That promise would no doubt be observed by the right hon. Gentleman, but he could not bind his successors. If the Bill were passed, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Monsell) in thinking that it would be fatal to the system of competitive examinations. As to the want of candidates for the Indian service, that was to be traced to the inadequate inducements that were held out, and he thought that nothing would be so unwise as to deal in a niggardly spirit with medical officers in such a climate as that of India. Those arrangements which would procure the most efficient medical officers for our troops in India would, in the end, be by far the cheapest arrangements this country could make.

SIR EDWARD COLÉBROOKE said, he also would express a hope that the right hon. Baronet would not attempt to force the Bill through during that Session. The House should regard with jealousy any measure which tended in the smallest degree to destroy the competitive examination system.

COLONEL SYKES expressed his entire approval of a local medical staff in India, as preferable to putting so many thousands of recruits into the hands of inexperienced persons. At the same time, he denied that the service proposed by the right hon. Baronet was necessary, seeing that the medical service in India was fast improving. He disapproved altogether of the removal of the existing tests, and would point out that while the right hon. Gentleman proposed to form a staff corps, by drawing from Her Majesty's service, there were at the present moment no less than 200 vacancies in that service.

MR. CLAY said, he could not understand, if the object of the right hon. Gentleman was to do so little, why he should have taken power in the Bill to do so much. The fact was the service had been up to a recent time very unpopular, but candidates were increasing, and he hoped that as the improvement went on, if they increased sufficiently, the right hon. Gentleman would in the next Session bring in a Bill to do just what was wanted and no more.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman would produce the regulations for the information of the House?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that he could not produce the regulations before the Bill was passed, because he had no power to do so.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, that in rising to move that the House go into Committee on the Bill, he trusted that he might be allowed to make one or two observations, inasmuch as he had been charged, without due foundation, firstly, with not having made a sufficiently full explanation of the objects of the Bill, and, secondly, with having made it at a very late hour. He would appeal to the House not to allow the measure to be lost, inasmuch as it was likely to mitigate the sufferings and miseries of a very unfortunate class of our fellow-beings—perhaps even to save their lives. He understood there were Members who intended to impede the progress of the Bill, chiefly on the ground that it involved a new principle which they thought dangerous, and which, if carried out, would, they said, impose a burden on property from which it had hitherto been comparatively exempt; and they said that with that novelty in the measure it ought not to be passed at so late a period of the Session. He would not deny that if the principle of the Bill were new there would be something in the argument, but there was no novelty in the principle, and the statement was, therefore, unsupported by the fact. It was stated that the measure threw the charge of that class of persons upon the whole property of the metropolis; that that had never been done before; and that such a precedent was extremely dangerous. There was, however, an Act of Parliament which embodied the very same principle for the support and relief of the same class of persons, and it was because there were provisions in that Act which could not be carried out that he brought in a measure to supply its defects. The measure to which he referred was the 7 & 8 Vict., which was brought in in consequence of a general desire in that House to remove what was felt to be a scandal and reproach to the metropolis—namely, that people wandering about without a habitation or settlement suffered the extreme consequences of want, so that every one was shocked by the scenes that took place. There was a strong feeling that something ought to be done, and a Bill was introduced and passed to carry out the principle that the metropolis ought to bear the burden of the support of these wayfarers. That Bill divided the metropolis into six districts, and applied the principle of the equalization of rates to the relief of that class of the poor. Rich parishes were combined with poor ones, and inquiry was made how the rates thus required could be levied equally. That Act, the 7 & 8 Vict., now existed, and embodied the principle to which the hon. Member for Westminster objected. When an attempt was made to enforce the provisions of that Bill, however, objections were made by the guardians, the overseers, and the ratepayers. They found that the machinery was cumbrous and costly—that the Bill required the creation of six great asylums, which were supplemental workhouses, and hardly adequate for the relief of the class of persons in question. These asylums were a great distance from each other, and from the relieving officers, and it would be necessary to keep up great establishments in them all the year round, while it was only at one period of the year that there was a great demand for admission. The Bill was so distasteful to the public that they refused to apply it. A Committee of that House inquired into the subject, and, by a majority of one, passed a Resolution recommending the Poor Law Board, which had the right of enforcing the Act, not to carry it into effect. Notwithstanding that, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Wilts (Mr. S. Estcourt), when he was President of the Poor Law Board, again tried to enforce the Act, but found that it was impossible. The question was brought before the Committee which sat to inquire into the general operation of the Poor Law, and they, after careful and deliberate inquiry, came to the conclusion that the reason why the parishes did not make adequate provision for that class of the poor was the unequal distribution of the charge, and therefore they proposed the remedy which was embodied in the Bill before the House—namely, that the charge should be made equal, that a common fund should be created from which these persons should be relieved, and that thus no parish should have an inducement to refuse to relieve them. That was important when they considered the nature of the opposition which was about to be offered. If the measure had originated with him as a private individual, or, indeed, as President of the Poor Law Board, there might have been some force in the objections which were about to be raised; but he did not think that the authority of those who were about to raise those objections would outweigh that of a Committee of which such sound Conservative authorities were members as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wilts, the hon. Members for Devonshire and Cheshire, he believed the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, the hon. Member for Petersfield, and the hon. Member for Whitehaven, all of whom had voted for the proposition which was embodied in the Bill. The whole opposition to the Bill arose from a fear that it might be a step towards the equalization of the rates throughout the metropolis. One objection would be that it contained no clause, such as was recommended by the Committee, giving to the Poor Law Board power to enforce upon parishes an effective provision by means of wards and buildings for the lodging of the poor. Such a power was already contained in the 4 & 5 Will. IV, but it was limited by a proviso which had reference to the expense, so that beyond a certain amount it was impossible to exert that authority. Under the Bill before them there need be no apprehension as to the expense, because the fourth clause cast the expense of providing wards or buildings, as well as that of maintenance, upon the new common fund. He did not believe that that was an honest objection, because it was impossible to tell exactly where the wards would be wanted, or what number might be required in any one parish. Indeed, some of the parishes which discharged their duty most efficiently had no wards. There was a variety of ways in which these people might be provided for; and if the liability to relieve them was fixed upon the parishes they would soon find some means of doing it, so that we should not be shocked by hearing of people starving in the street. If, however, the objection was persevered in, it might be met by an Amendment of a single line which he had ready, providing that no union or parish should have the benefit of the Act which did not comply with the requirements of the Poor Law Board. Another objection which might be urged against the Bill which proposed that the Metropolitan Board of Works should collect the rates by which the fund was to be raised, was that that Board had by a small majority expressed their wish to have nothing to do with the matter. He never supposed that they would desire to have anything to do with it. He did not believe a word of what the hon. Member for Westminster said about their being an ambitious body who were anxious to extend their jurisdiction, and whom it was necessary to watch. The casting upon a machinery or a public body the duty of collecting a rate which was not strictly applicable to the purposes for which they were originally created was not new in principle. The overseers and guardians at present collected, under the title of poor rate, a great deal of money which was not expended upon the relief of the poor. He had not consulted the Metropolitan Board upon the subject, but as a matter of courtesy he informed them of what he was about to propose, and said that he hoped they would not object to perform the merely ministerial act of collecting the sum of £5,000; and he believed that they were men of so much patriotism and good feeling, that if this duty were cast upon them they would not shrink from its discharge. It could give them no trouble, and they might be performing a great act of humanity by lending themselves to that purpose. To the objection that it was late in the Session, he replied that the Bill was a very short Bill, and that unless a factious opposition was raised to it there was plenty of time to pass it. Last year the Session was, he believed, slightly prolonged in order that a measure for the better protection of game might be passed, and he saw no reason why, if necessary, a similar prolongation might not be submitted to in order to enable the Bill before them to receive the sanction of Parliament. As to the incidence of the rate, in nine cases out of ten there existed arrangements between landlords and tenants by which the latter paid the sewer rate. It did not matter who paid the rate; it must come out of the rent. It was not, however, correct to say, that at present the cost of the relief of the poor was entirely defrayed out of sums raised by rates paid by the tenant. The State contributed to the payment of masters of workhouses and schools, of doctors and auditors, and when paupers were sent into the lunatic asylum or as vagrants to prison they were supported out of the county rate. He could not help thinking, under those circumstances, that it was extremely desirable that the facilities proposed by the Bill should be conferred, and he trusted that goodwill would be brought to bear upon the discussion, and that a great scandal would not be allowed to continue.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. C. P. Villiers.)

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he was sorry he could not agree with his right hon. Friend in thinking that the mode in which the Bill was introduced or the time at which it was brought forward were not open to objection. He was ready to admit that the existing state of things required that some remedy should be provided, but his right hon. Friend did not appear to him to have a full appreciation of the great difficulties with which the Question was beset. He wished briefly to remind the House of the circumstances under which the present proposition was made. It professed to be founded on the recommendation of a Committee which sat three years on the Poor Law administration of this country, but he would endeavour to show that it did not precisely conform to those recommendations. The Committee reported on the 31st of May, and their Report was ordered to be printed on that day; but from that time until about a week ago the House had received no intimation that it was the intention of the Government to legislate on the subject. It was not, indeed, until his hon. Friend the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Lyall) had asked a question with regard to it, that the right hon. Gentleman had announced that he had a Bill already prepared. In accordance with that announcement the Bill was introduced on the 19th of July, at a late period of the evening, as he was informed, for he did not happen to be present on the occasion. And what, he would ask, followed? Instead of affording a little time to those interested in the question to consider the measure, the second reading was moved on the following day, at an advanced hour of the day. There was some reason for complaining, therefore, that his right hon. Friend had rather stolen a march on the House in introducing a Bill of such importance at the end of the Session, and pressing it on for discussion in the very week when it was understood the sitting of Parliament was about to terminate. The Bill was, he maintained, one of the most important in its principle and operation which had in the present Session been submitted to the notice of the House. It involved a problem which was, perhaps, about the most difficult of solution of any connected with that difficult branch of administration with which his right hon. Friend had to deal. The evil against which it was directed no doubt existed in the great city, or rather, he might say, the immense mass of cities to which it applied. There was, it must be admitted, in the metropolis a wandering, houseless, destitute population, for which there was no adequate provision. About twenty years ago an attempt was made to deal with the very same question. Sir James Graham introduced and carried a Bill which had the same object as that before the House, but which was of a character far more judicious and better prepared. His right hon. Friend had quoted that as a precedent for the measure which he proposed, but there was a very broad distinction between the two proposals. The Bill of Sir James Graham established districts for the relief of the poor, and the relief was to be dispensed by those who collected the rates out of which it was to be administered. There was to be a Board in each of those districts, selected from the Board of Guardians, which was to be intrusted with the management of the asylums constituted under the Act. Those who were taxed were those who had the administration of the relief; but his objection to the measure before them was, that it proposed to intrust the numerous bodies throughout the metropolis connected with the relief of the poor with the administration of funds collected from the whole of the metropolis. There were thirty-eight of those bodies, and the rental of the area which would come under the operation of the Bill was between £12,000,000 and £13,000,000, or not far short of the rental of the whole of Ireland, and every one of the bodies in question would have the power to give relief without stint to the casual poor. [Mr. C. P. VILLIERS: No, no!] He certainly read the Bill in that way, and the auditor would have no check on the administration of relief or the discretion of the guardians in granting it. It should under those circumstances be borne in mind that those for whom provision was sought to be made was not a limited class which could be dealt with as a constant body. Indeed, the great difficulty in the matter was that indiscriminate relief had a tendency to increase the numbers of the vagrant class, and thus to throw an additional burden upon the country. Mr. Buller in 1848 published a minute on the subject of vagrancy, which was well worthy of the consideration of the House, and in which he stated that it had a tendency, as it were, to spring from the ground under the operation of a system of indiscriminate relief, until at last it became overwhelming in its extent beyond all contemplation. There was, he might add, a curious instance given in one of the early reports emanating from Mr. Commissioner Hall, in which a case of great alleged hardship on the refusal of relief to a pauper boy was brought before the magistrates, who indulged in some severe remarks on the conduct of the officials by whom the relief was refused; the consequence being that the provisions on the subject were relaxed; and as a result, as

Mr. Hall stated, 15,000 persons applied for relief in eight weeks, and the evil at last became intolerable. The truth was the House, in dealing with the subject, were like the knights fighting about the two sides of the shield. There were two distinct classes by whom relief was sought. Everybody was disposed to look with sympathy on the case of the honest mechanic out of work, or that of the widow and of the orphan children who had nobody to succour them. But there was a very different class—a squalid lazzaroni class—who were always ready to live on charity; and in the minute of Mr. Buller, to which he had already referred, he found the rapid increase of vagrancy in England and Wales reported at the time to exist—attributed principally to the system which had been adopted for the relief of the casual poor. There might, no doubt, be an attempt made to grapple with what was unquestionably a great evil, but then the subject was surrounded by immense difficulties which gentlemen coming from all parts of the country had a right to expect sufficient time would be allowed as far as possible to solve, and which should not be sought to be disposed of in the last week of the Session by means of a measure which was to be shoved through Parliament without discussion, while those who objected to that course being taken were charged with factious opposition. His right hon. Friend said the Bill was founded on the Report of the Committee which he had mentioned, but the fact was that that Committee recommended a good deal more than he proposed. They passed the following Resolutions:—

“In order to secure sufficient and convenient means for the relief of the casual and houseless poor within the metropolis, as defined by the Metropolitan Local Management Act, it is expedient that the charges incurred for the support of such poor should be paid out of a rate assessed on the annual rateable value of the whole of the said metropolis. That, in the opinion of this Committee, the machinery adopted under the Metropolitan Local Management Act might be made available for raising the amount of such charge, and your Committee recommend that authority be given to the Metropolitan Board of Works for such purpose.”

Then they go on to say—

“That the Poor Law Board be empowered to prescribe and enforce all necessary arrangements for providing the requisite accommodation in the several unions and parishes, and otherwise carrying the foregoing Resolutions into effect. That, with the view of suppressing vagrancy as far as practicable, the Committee are of opinion that the central authority, when invested with adequate power for that purpose, should direct Boards of Guardians to provide suitable and sufficient wards for the reception of the wayfaring and wandering poor, and that the regulations for their management and relief should be on a uniform system throughout the country."

[Mr. C. P. VILLIERS: This is a recommendation only for the metropolis.] Just so, but it was a matter which affected not merely the metropolis, but all the districts of the country, and what he dreaded was, that by removing from the local Boards all motive for strict—nay, he would even say scurvy and stingy administration of relief—there would be an indiscriminate and lavish distribution which, instead of a godsend, would be a curse to the poor themselves. He hoped his right hon. Friend would not reckon him among those who he seemed to think were ready to give a factious opposition to the Bill; on the contrary, he should be willing to lend him all the assistance in his power to pass a satisfactory measure. It was only because he believed it to be impossible to pass a satisfactory measure at that period of the Session, and because he believed his right hon. Friend, by passing a Bill in a hurried way, was incurring a great risk, in which he should not be willing to share, that he begged to move that the House go into Committee on the Bill that day month.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day month, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Edward Pleydell Bouverie)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. LYALL said, that although he concurred in many of the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, he did not agree with his observation that there was no urgency in the case. On the contrary, the Committee of which he had been a Member thought it a subject which deserved the early consideration of Parliament. Some time back the right hon. Gentleman, in reply to the hon. Member for Norfolk, stated that the subject would require several Bills, and that no general Bill would be introduced by the Government during the year. After the harrowing cases of distress amongst the poor of London during severe winter weather, of which they all had read in the newspapers, it would not be a comforting reflection at Christmas that a Bill providing relief had been opposed and thrown out. The Bill did not involve the principle of an extension of the area of rating generally, nor of an extension of the area of rating in the metropolis. Twenty years ago the Act of the 7 & 8 Vict. recognized the principle of general rating in each of the six districts of the metropolis on the rateable value, on the ground that the relief of casual poor was on a different footing from the relief of the resident poor. The 7 & 8 Vict. could not have been a very good measure, as it had proved unworkable and had been a dead letter. He thought the time had arrived when Parliament ought to pass a workable measure for the relief of the casual poor, and he would suggest that the Bill should be restricted in its operation to one year. Perhaps, however, that might not be necessary, inasmuch as the whole system of the Poor Laws must come before Parliament next Session, as the Poor Law Commission would expire in 1865, unless renewed by Parliament.

Mr. BRISCOE said, he felt great apprehension lest the Bill, instead of alleviating the misery of the vagrant population, would be the means of increasing it. The cases of starvation reported by the press had not been among the casual and the vagrant, but among the resident poor, who were unwilling to enter a workhouse, and would have been saved by a modicum of out-relief. The Bill would increase the number of vagrants. The proposal to put the relief of vagrant and casual poor in the metropolis on the general fund would be an invitation for all the beggars in the country to flock to the metropolis. He remembered asking a party of beggars, having the appearance of bricklayers and bricklayers' labourers, where they came from. They replied, "Windsor." "But," said he, "why come to London?" "Oh," was the reply, "we can get at any workhouse a night's lodging and some food, and then we chance it for the day." This the Bill would increase. Besides, it would have the effect of superseding all voluntary charity. Therefore, he should support the Amendment; and he hoped that the President of the Poor Law Board would consent to postpone the Bill for the future consideration of the House when it again opened.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to say a word, as he believed he was the only Conservative Member present who was on the Committee, and who was in favour of the principle of the Bill. As such he felt he had a right to complain of the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman, for he had placed him and those who were in the same situation in a painful dilemma. Had the Bill been introduced at a period of the Session when it was possible to consider it properly, he would have given it his heartiest support. There was an enormous evil to be remedied. Every winter most frightful cases of death from destitution were recorded in the newspapers, causing the deepest dissatisfaction with the working of the Poor Law, and numbers succumbed to disease brought on by want, whose deaths never got into the papers at all. If they did not give some power to the guardians to relieve this distress next winter, a fresh contingent would be added to the tale of persons whose fate was already laid to the charge of Parliament, who had suffered them to perish in spite of the professedly humane principles of the English law. That was a terrible responsibility to impose upon them. It was an awful alternative to have to choose between disregarding the ordinary form and rules of the House, and passing a Bill on a novel principle, which might produce evils they could not foresee, as they had not time to consider it adequately, or encountering the responsibility of having contributed to the starvation of their fellow creatures. The right hon. Gentleman had no right to place that terrible alternative before them. Under these circumstances, knowing as he did how great the evil was, he hesitated to vote against the Bill. No other compromise appeared to be open to them, under the difficulties of the case, than to ask the right hon. Gentleman to allow the Bill to terminate in February or March next, so that it might be in force during the winter. He hoped they would not be held to pledge themselves to any principle in agreeing to that temporary remedy for the evil which pressed upon them so. Next year they could discuss the questions and settle the basis on which it should rest, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would assent to the proposal.

MR. LOCKE said, he quite concurred in the noble Lord's suggestion, though he could not concur with the Mover of the Amendment as to the difficulties which might result from the passing of the measure. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) had stated that there would be no check upon the expenditure, but if he had looked into the Bill he would have seen provision was made by the first clause that on the part of the Poor Law Board the same checks that were now applied to the relief of the poor should continue, and thus that one uniform system must be adopted throughout the metropolis. He believed that the whole amount that would have to be raised by the Metropolitan Board of Works under this Bill would be about £6,000 a year, and when they considered the large area over which the authority of the Board extended, a rate of a farthing in the pound would answer all purposes. Were they, then, to talk of the lavish expenditure of money that might take place, and the number of vagrants that might come into the town? The argument of the hon. Member for West Surrey, when he observed that the measure would do away with private charity, applied to any poor law; but his belief was, that however the public arrangements for the relief of the poor might be enlarged, there would always be ample room for the exercise of private charity. When he first had a seat in that House the Member for Kilmarnock was President of the Poor Law Board, and looking at the right hon. Gentleman's career while he held that office, he could not discover that he ever did anything to ameliorate the condition of the poor, but, on the contrary, every proposition with that object had always been received by him with steady opposition. If on the present occasion the right hon. Gentleman, instead of opposing the Bill upon its principle, had brought his experience to bear to remedy its defects when they got into Committee, he would have taken a more worthy course. The Bill would do something to remedy those terrible stories which always appeared in the winter season, and if it was defective its faults might be remedied next year.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the Question was, the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock's Amendment, and not his past career at the Poor Law Board. The Bill involved two important principles—the extension of uniform rating, and the transfer of the Poor Law affairs to the Metropolitan Board of Works. [MR. C. P. VILLIERS: No!] He could not but regard these principles with apprehension and doubt. His noble Friend the Member for Stamford had described in touching terms the great evil which required to be remedied; but the greater the evil the more inexcusable was it in the right hon. Gentleman not to have brought forward the Bill at an earlier period. The Bill involved principles for the discussion of which the House had a right to expect time and opportunity, and it was neither decorous nor courteous to submit such a Bill in the very last week of the Session, when it might have been introduced at any time during the last three months. It was a dangerous precedent, which they ought to discourage. He felt the difficulty pointed out by his noble Friend, but he thought they had a right to look to the President of the Poor Law Board to prevent the recurrence of the evils in question during the winter, and to introduce the Bill at a proper time next Session.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he had no wish to raise a factious opposition to the Bill; but he thought the House had a right to find fault with the President of the Poor Law Board for not having allowed more time for the consideration of the Bill, seeing that the Committee had reported so far back as May. He agreed with the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord R. Cecil) as to the awkward position in which the House was placed. It was easy to say that those who objected to the Bill were wanting in proper feeling towards the casual poor, but there was no ground whatever for that assertion. The right hon. Gentleman urged that there was nothing for it but to bring in a Bill of that kind, the District Asylum Act having failed; but the reason why that Act failed was because it was permissive merely, and the right hon. Gentleman should have introduced a Bill to make it compulsory. That Act, as he believed, worked very well, till one Metropolitan Union made an objection, and directions were thereupon given that no further steps should be taken in the matter. He could not help suspecting that the Bill before the House was an attempt to get in the thin edge of the wedge, and that sooner or later it would be sought to have a district rating for the whole of the metropolis. One great objection which he had to the measure was that under it the money would not be expended by those who paid and who had an incentive to check its improper application. Moreover, the Bill went in direct opposition to the 90th clause of the Metropolis Local Management Act, which expressly provided that the Metropolitan Board of Works should have nothing whatever to do with the funds raised for the relief of the poor; and he was glad that that Board had upon consideration decided, by however small a majority, against its being mixed up with this matter. It would be much better for the Poor Law Board, if it had the power, to compel Boards of Guardians to do their duty. Without denying the claims of the casual poor upon their commiseration, it should not be forgotten that there was one class of vagrants in all parts of the country, and especially in the metropolis, between whom and the really deserving it was necessary to discriminate. He alluded to the class of sturdy beggars, who had a strong repugnance to work for their living; and it would, he thought, be dangerous to teach such persons that they had only to come up to London to get food and lodging for nothing. Indeed, he did not see why if that Bill was really good for the metropolis it should not be good for Liverpool, Birmingham, and other large towns. In conclusion, he firmly believed, after the discussion which had taken place in that House, that no Board of Guardians would dare to neglect its duty in this matter.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, that feeling strongly that in a rich and prosperous community no person should run the risk of starvation, he regretted that the Bill had not been introduced at an earlier period of the Session. The Bill was founded upon a wrong principle, and was opposed to the whole of their legislation for relief of the poor. He denied, therefore, that those who opposed the measure were fairly open to the charge of factiousness or hard-heartedness. Nothing could be more objectionable to the ratepayers of the metropolis than the proposal to give such powers to the Metropolitan Board of Works as were contained in the Bill. It was wrong to impose on that Board duties inconsistent with those which they were elected to perform. Their hands were already full and they had solemnly expressed their aversion to have these foreign duties imposed upon them, which they could not perform with satisfaction to themselves or to their constituents. Not only did the Bill do so, but it sought to apply funds raised for one purpose—the sewage of the metropolis—to another, the relief of the poor; and it involved the proposal of shifting the burden of supporting the poor from the occupiers to the owners of property. Marylebone parish contained one-twelfth of the valuation of the metropolis; and if the entire relief for houseless poor was to amount to £6,000, that parish must pay for its quota, £500, though it might not be called upon to relieve houseless poor to the extent of £100 a year. Thus that parish would suffer by the change to the extent of £400 a year. But the metropolis ought not to be singled out for the application of a measure of this kind. If it were a good one it ought to be applied to the entire country, and ought not to be brought in at a time when Members were out of town. The noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil), who was a Member of the Committee on the subject, suggested that the measure was only to continue in operation until March next, when the severity of winter should be over, and he (Mr. Harvey Lewis) objected to a measure of this kind being made permanent.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that the objection to the measure seemed to be directed more to the manner in which it was proposed to be administered than to the raising of the funds from the entire metropolis. It was an objection, however, based rather on sentiment than on principle, and was worthy rather of the vestry room than the House of Commons. It was said that if relief were expanded the number of destitute poor would increase. But would it be for a moment contended that the present state of things should be allowed longer to exist over another winter. The floating poor were of necessity driven eastwards—the residents of the West End were relieved of their presence—they said they were willing to contribute to their support, and if they were sincere in their profession they ought not to object to the Bill. The homeless poor did not belong to east or west, but were the common charge of the entire metropolis, and any measure which made the metropolis support them was a proper one, and did not at all interfere with the principle that every district should provide for its own poor.

MR. C. S. BUTLER said, he should support the Bill. It was to be regretted that more time had not been allotted for consideration, but he hoped that another winter would not be allowed to pass without some measure to afford relief to the destitute classes in whose behalf the Bill was introduced being adopted. He had communicated with the various Boards of Guardians in the eastern districts of the metropolis, and they were in favour of the Bill, and were anxious that it should become law.

LORD FERMOY said, that whether the proposed legislation was good or bad it was at all events hasty, and hasty legislation was always open to objection. He agreed in the principle of the measure so far as it declared that provision ought to be made for the homeless poor. But was there no alternative to passing the Bill? He maintained there was. The central authority had power enough by the present law to compel recusant Boards of Guardians to provide refuge wards for the homeless poor. His constituents had done this, and public opinion in the metropolis was in favour of that course. Let the right hon. Gentleman try the power he had, and he would find it unnecessary to pass such a Bill as that before the House for one winter. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that every Member of the Committee was bound by its recommendations. Now, he must say, while he felt bound by the Report as a whole, he objected to piecemeal legislation. The Committee had certainly agreed to the principle of the Bill; but they did not stop there. They proposed, by the power of the central body, to compel all Boards of Guardians throughout the country to deal liberally with the casual poor; but the right hon. Gentleman brought in a Bill to deal with the metropolis, and ignored the whole country. Was that fair to the metropolis? The result of not providing for the casual poor elsewhere would be to send them in greater numbers to the metropolis. The right hon. Gentleman ought to have dealt with the whole country in a comprehensive way, instead of which he had brought in a limited and one-sided measure, which he felt perfectly free to vote against. He advised the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw the present Bill, and let the country consider the whole subject in the recess; and when a general measure was introduced next Session it would probably pass without much altercation.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman had consulted any of the parishes in the metropolis with respect to the Bill, and what answers he had received. On the general question it was impossible for any one who lived in the metropolis, or read what appeared in the newspapers, not to feel that something should be done to relieve the casual poor. It was no party question. It was one of simple humanity. Still the principle of the measure was so important, and the opportunity for considering it so brief, that he hoped the Bill would be limited to the month of March next.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he would answer the Question put to him by the hon. Baronet, Whether he had taken any steps to ascertain the feeling of the metropolitan districts with respect to this Bill? Distinctly he had done so; and with respect to the lateness of the period when the Bill was introduced he might say, the Report of the Committee was made on the 31st of May; it was printed and delivered on the 18th of June. He did then take the course which the hon. Baronet seemed to think he ought to have done—to ascertain what the opinion of the metropolis affected by the Bill was, and as soon as he had ascertained that he gave notice of the Bill; at least he announced his intention in reply to a question put by the hon. Member for Whitehaven. He took steps to legislate on that portion of the Report which he thought most urgent. He had not during the course of the discussion been able to collect any real objections to the Bill. The existence of the evil which the Bill was proposed to remedy had not been denied, nor had it been urged that the Bill was not likely to meet those evils. He had not heard a single Member say that the Bill did not fairly represent the Report and the recommendation of the Committee, or that it would not have the effect of preventing those shocking occurrences which they all regretted so much. All that they had heard was that it had been introduced at a wrong time, and there never was a measure against which its opponents upon other grounds failed to urge the same objection. One objection to the Bill was an apprehension as to what might follow. [Sir MINTO FARQUHAR: What were the replies of the parishes?] He believed that only one out of the whole of the metropolitan parishes was unfavourable to the measure. The hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. H. Lewis) appeared to object to the Bill on account of an apprehension as to the increase of cost, but he might mention that a portion of the hon. Gentleman's constituency, the inhabitants of St. Pancras, an important district of the borough, had, as far as he could gather from their communications, highly approved the Bill. They had passed a resolution and appeared to be unanimously in its favour, but thought that the district was hardly large enough, and that it ought to be a police district. The noble Lord the Member for Marylebone (Lord Fermoy) had given notice of his intention of moving an Amendment with that object. It had been urged against the Bill that it would afford increased temptations to vagrancy, but he could not perceive anything in the mode of relief which could possibly lead to that result. The hon. Member for Westminster (Sir John Shelley) objected to the Bill because he believed it would attract vagrants from the country from the circumstance that no one would be turned away. He did not, however, regard that as a result which was likely to follow. He had believed it to be better to bring in the Bill late in the Session rather than not at all, and, as he was confident in the success of the experiment, he was willing to agree to the proposal which had been made to limit the operations of the Act to the first of April next. That limit would cover the period within which the shocking cases which had been referred to would be likely to occur.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, that he would withdraw his Amendment upon that understanding, but he must insist upon satisfactory evidence being adduced to show that the Boards of Guardians possessed proper places for the reception of the casual poor previous to the reimbursement of their expenses by the Metropolitan Board of Works.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow at One of the clock.

MUTUAL SURRENDER OF CRIMINALS (PRUSSIA) BILL.—[BILL 231.]—(Lords.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

MR. WHITE said, he rose to move that the House resolve itself into a Committee upon the Bill on that day month. The measure had arisen from a convention signed in London, March 5, 1864. He held that it was not respectful or decorous to the House that such a Bill should be delayed to so late a period of the Session. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had just informed him that this measure had passed the House of Lords. That might be a strong recommendation to the hon. Gentleman, but with all respect to the House of Lords, it was not the slightest recommendation to him (Mr. White). The Prussian Government would have the power, under the Bill, to follow an unfortunate exile into this country, and, upon suspicion that he had attempted to commit murder, to have him captured, and sent back to Prussia. After the atrocious conduct of Prussia in Posen—he would say nothing of later transactions—he thought there were very strong reasons to hesitate before they entered into an extradition treaty of this kind with that country. If any Prussian subject were supposed to have sympathy with the Poles across the frontier, and had entered the British territory, the Bill would give the Prussian Government power to persecute that individual by trumping up a charge of attempting to murder against him, and demand that he should be given up to them. The Bill also gave the Prussian Government power to demand the extradition of a subject who had fled to this country, who was supposed to be guilty of robbery with violence. There was something ludicrous in the idea of Prussia coming to ask for justice against persons who had been guilty of robbery with violence. The murderer of Mr. Briggs was believed to be a German; but with regard to such a man there was no difficulty, as our laws were sufficient to meet a case of that kind. Now that we had a well-grounded belief in an association or a Holy Alliance of the great Northern Powers it seemed to him (Mr. White) somewhat suspicious that M. Bismark should want a Bill of this character. If the measure were passed, the time would come when Austria would apply to us for a similar measure; and Russia afterwards. He believed that the Bill was not intended for its ostensible purpose. He looked upon the measure as one aimed against political exiles and that it was intended to prevent us affording an asylum to patriots who fled here for refuge from the persecutions inflicted upon them in their own country. If there were any real value in the Bill it should not have been delayed until the end of the Session, when it was almost impossible to discuss its merits. The conduct of Prussia was not of a nature calculated to secure the good opinion of England. At all events, the Bill was not of such pressing importance that it ought not to be postponed until the next Session. Under these circumstances he should move that the House should resolve itself into a Committee upon it that day month.

MR. HENNESSY seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day month, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. James White,)

—instead thereof.

MR. LAYARD said, that the object was merely to confirm a simple extradition treaty such as we had with Italy, France, and other Powers. Although the convention bore date the 5th of March the ratifications had not been exchanged till the 8th of April. The Bill had no political tendency. We had similar conventions with other European nations for mutual convenience; and his hon. Friend (Mr. White) must remember that the provisions of the convention could not be put in force without a legal process. The convention applied to persons accused or convicted of murder; comprehending the crimes of assassination, parricide, infanticide, and poisoning, attempt to commit murder, forgery, fraudulent bankruptcy, burglary, robbery with violence to the person robbed, larceny, or embezzlement by clerks and servants. It would be a great convenience to us to have the convention, and he could assure the House that there was nothing in it which ought to alarm even a Gentleman of the advanced political opinions of his hon. Friend, for there was no desire on the part of the Government to put an end to the patriotic feeling of Prussian patriots.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he could not agree that the question was quite so simple a matter as the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs would have them believe, neither did he feel satisfied that the political element was excluded from the treaty. The great difficulty they had to look at was the law of conscription, and what he feared was that under the Bill they would be called upon to apprehend deserters for a despotic Power. Now, a case in point had just happened? Certain Poles escaped from the Russian army and fled to America, and they were demanded by Russia from America under a similar extradition treaty. Conscription was often used as a mere engine of oppression, and deserter was very often used as only another name for political exile, and what he wanted to show was that something of the same kind might be included in the Bill. Burglary by the law of Germany meant a nocturnal breaking or forcing into any dwelling-house or any building thereunto belonging with the intention of committing a crime. It did not mean an English crime but a Prussian crime, and that might mean desertion. So that a soldier who escaped from his barracks and broke through an outside building for the purpose of desertion would come within the clause in the Bill. He thought it would have been much better if the Bill had stated distinctly the exact nature of the crime, and not have given two lines of German to explain an English word. [Mr. LAYARD: That is childish.] He would thank the hon. Gentleman to refute his argument. What he objected to was that the Bill took cognizance of a Prussian crime and not an English crime, without any attempt to define it. The same kind of objection applied to the crime of embezzlement. We might call it embezzlement, but by the German it was breach of duty; and what he feared was, that by the terms of the treaty we should be delivering over those who came to our shores to an extent we little thought of. He did not say that all the things at which he had glanced would happen, but they might happen. The Bill was not drawn with that caution and circumspection that was necessary, considering the particular country with which we were dealing and the spirit of our own laws. He thought the Bill should be delayed and further time given for its consideration.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought his noble Friend had not rightly apprehended either the provisions of the Bill or the general principles which pervaded all measures of the same nature. If his noble Friend would consider the matter he would see that in conformity with the treaty itself the Bill provided expressly that no one should be delivered up except such evidence was produced as according to the English law would justify a magistrate in committing him for the offence in this country. That principle was perfectly well settled. The matter was fully considered in the case of the slave Anderson, who was demanded for extradition from Canada on the ground of his having committed what by the law of the United States was considered murder—namely, killing the person who sought to apprehend him and deliver him back to slavery. But it was held by the highest authorities in this country that he could not be delivered up, for this reason—that a man who killed another while defending his own liberty could not be guilty of murder according to the laws of this country. And in the cases instanced by the noble Lord the crimes should, according to the laws of the United Kingdom, have amounted to burglary or embezzlement, and that was the language not only of the statute but of the treaty also. In truth, the words to which the noble Lord had referred were used only for the purpose of making clear to the German mind what the English words burglary and embezzlement meant. English words must be interpreted by English magistrates in an English sense—the German terms were merely equivalents. No one could doubt that according to the Bill and the treaty an English magistrate must be satisfied that the accused person had been guilty of what would be the offence of burglary or larceny according to the English laws.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would remind the House that the Question had really arisen, not as between England and Prussia, but as between Russia and Prussia. He found that one of the crimes included in the schedule was robbery with violence. Now what had happened? A certain number of Polish refugees were apprehended in Prussia, under a similar treaty between Russia and Prussia, and when England and France remonstrated, the answer was that they had been apprehended on a charge of robbery with alleged violence, they having stolen some forage, or something of that sort. The consequence was that the political refugees had been given up to Russia. Now it was remarkable that it was the first time not only that the Prussian word for burglary would come into an Act of Parliament, but also the words "robbery with violence." That was the definition of burglary which it was sought to introduce into an English Act of Parliament. He had no confidence in the Bill after what our Government had done with our own police. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, unfortunately for his own reputation and also that of the Government and the country, sent two English detectives, at a critical time, to Russia. He (Mr. Hennessy) stated at the time that the two detectives received £1,000 each from the Russian Government, and he would now inform the House why it was they were paid that money. Before the Polish insurrection broke out the Grand Duke Constantine applied to this country for two detectives to be sent to Warsaw, and by the Home Secretary's permission they went there, at a time when the severity of the Prussian rule was so great that almost every country in Europe had remonstrated. A Polish exile, who had been many years in this country, went to Warsaw with a British passport in the name of Brett. He (Mr. Hennessey) heard when at Cracow, that Walker, one of these detectives, saw Brett in the streets of Warsaw, recognized him, and he was arrested. That was before the insurrection. Brett was cast into prison, and three months after the insurrection broke out Brett was taken out and hanged in the streets of Warsaw. That man travelled under a British passport in an assumed name. He was a refugee, but he never fought against Russia. However, the unfortunate man was hanged, and the two English bullies received £1,000 each. It was notorious that the Duke Constantine was assisted by the English and French police in detecting the Polish refugees from Paris and London, some of whom it was desirous to place in the list of proscriptions, and others in the list of conscription. They had seen enough of these proceedings to be cautious how they allowed a Bill of this kind to pass. The Prussian Government strained laws such as that before them against political offenders, and he hoped the House would reject the Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the hon. Gentleman had recurred to a subject with regard to which the fullest information had been afforded last year. Every paper connected with the matter had been laid upon the table; the hon. Gentleman did not last year make the charge which he had just now made, and he (Sir George Grey) utterly disbelieved that there was any foundation whatever for it. The House was perfectly satisfied, when the subject was last year before it, with the explanation that had been given. The hon. Gentleman had said that Prussia had delivered up the Polish refugees under a treaty similar to that before the House. But had the hon. Gentleman compared both treaties? If he had he would admit the force of his argument; if not, he could not admit that it was good for anything.

MR. AYRTON said, that no answer had been given to the Question asked by his hon. Friend (Mr. White)—namely, whether a person was to be given up charged with murder or attempt to murder without any qualification. It was said he was not to be given up unless he was guilty of an offence the commission of which would make him liable to be convicted of murder in England. If a man engaged in an insurrection in England he might be liable to be tried for murder, because any act contrary to law that ended in death was murder in England. Therefore, under the Bill, all political refugees might be given up if engaged in acts which in England would be illegal if carried on against the Government. If so, he did not see what was to prevent the Poles who took refuge in England after an insurrection being charged with simple murder—that is to say, killing or attempting to kill any of the subjects of the Czar. They would all be liable to be claimed and given up under this Bill.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that the explanation of the hon. and learned Attorney General appeared to be satisfactory as respected persons accused; but the convention also contained a provision that fugitives convicted of crime should be given up on a copy of the conviction being produced. Some further safeguards were necessary.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he thought there was great force in what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman (Sir Francis Goldsmid). In foreign countries a man might be convicted of crime in his absence par contumace. A man who was a political refugee might be convicted of any crime in his absence. There ought to be something to guard against a conviction such as that. If he understood the Attorney General, the learned Gentleman stated that a man could not be given up unless a magistrate here was satisfied that the circumstances were such that the man would be convicted of the crime if the circumstances occurred in this country. But take the case of burglary. That was a technical crime, and must be committed in certain hours between night and morning. Was it meant that the same circumstances which constituted the crime of burglary in this country must be proved in every case under the treaty?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had no hesitation in saying that the circumstances required in this country must be proved in order to justify extradition.

MR. CLAY said, he wished to know if there was any difference between the treaty and other extradition treaties which we had concluded with foreign countries. The other treaties had worked well, and inasmuch as we had not been called upon to give up under them political offenders or persons who had been engaged in insurrection, he did not see that there was any objection to that before the House, if it was similar to the rest. An answer to that question would, he thought, prevent the discussion being protracted.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I think the explanation given by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General ought to be sufficient. It is not true, as has been supposed, that a Foreign Government would send here and claim a man, requiring that a statement of his guilt should be taken without any further inquiry, and that its own explanation of its own law is to be the rule according to which a man should be given up. The treaty requires that proof shall be given to satisfy a magistrate that if the offence charged had been committed in this country, it would, according to our law, justify the committal of the man. Therefore, that clearly excludes any foreign interpretation of any crime under which a man can be claimed under the treaty in question. This treaty is exactly the same with what has been concluded with Denmark. I may state from my own knowledge, that in regard to the treaty with France difficulties have arisen, and complaints have been made by the French Government in consequence of the conditions attached to the delivery of the man. We have required that witnesses should come over, and that oral testimony should be given to prove that the man has committed in France a crime which in England would justify his committal. The French Government required that written documents should be sufficient. But this we have not admitted, and that has sometimes prevented our delivering up a French criminal claimed by the French Government. It is quite clear that no political offender could be claimed under this treaty. As to the notion that the fact of a man having been concerned in an insurrection would bring him in this country under the description of a murderer, that is really not for a moment to be entertained. The laws of this country would not construe that to be murder which is simply being engaged in civil war against the Government of the country. Therefore, there can be no sort of apprehension that this treaty could be used for the purpose of enabling Foreign Governments—whether Prussia, or Russia, or any other—to claim a political offender. As to the assertion of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Hennessy) that political offenders may be claimed, as between Prussia and Russia, under the extradition treaty between those countries, that may be true, because the crime of insurrection may be a crime which under that treaty may justify one Government in claiming a refugee from another. It does not, however, follow that a political refugee can, under the operation of the English law, be claimed under the provisions of this treaty.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Clay) had asked the noble Lord whether the present treaty was identical with the extradition treaties with other countries? He understood the noble Lord to state that this was quite a different extradition treaty. [Viscount PALMERSTON: I said it was the same.] The noble Lord had pointed out the inconvenience which the present extradition treaty with France had caused.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he wished to explain. He had stated that the present treaty was the same as other extradition treaties, and, as a proof of the safeguards which the treaty gave to persons claimed, he stated that with regard to the treaty with France difficulties had arisen about giving up a man because oral proof had not been given that the man had committed a crime in France which in England would justify his committal.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that there was an inconsistency between the noble Lord's explanation and the second clause of the Bill. It would be necessary for some legal Member of the Government to point out the words in the clause that corresponded with the terms of the extradition treaty now in force.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he thought the Attorney General had clearly explained that it must be proved that a fugitive had committed an act which in this country would justify his committal, otherwise he would not be given up.

MR. LOCKE said, he wished to point out that the paragraph of the section headed "thirdly" provided that, in the case of a fugitive convicted of crime, an authenticated copy of the conviction should be produced, and proof of the identity of the person convicted be given to the satisfaction of the magistrate. Therefore, if either a man was convicted in Prussia en contumace of an attempt to murder, and was convicted in his presence and afterwards escaped, his only offence having been that he was engaged in an insurrection, all that the Prussian authorities would have to do to obtain his surrender by this country would be to produce an authenticated copy of the conviction and give evidence that the man they claimed was the person named in it. He did not know whether that provision was identical with those contained in other extradition treaties, but we certainly ought not to strain any point in favour of Prussia, who was doing her best to put down liberty on the Continent.

Mr. FERRAND said, that as it was a Bill which greatly affected the character of the country, he should move the adjournment of the debate, in order that the measure might be discussed at a proper period of the evening.

Mr. CRAUFURD said, he wished to call attention to the circumstance that the paragraph of the second section headed "secondly" contained a provision—

"That depositions or statements on oath, certified under the hand of the magistrate by whom the original warrant was issued, and attested by the oath of the party producing them to be the original depositions or statements, or true copies thereof, may be received in evidence of the criminality of the fugitive apprehended."

That appeared to be a departure from the principle upon which the noble Lord stated that we had acted under the treaty with France. If he was not mistaken, in consequence of the objections of the French Government, an Act was brought in which would have authorized the reception of depositions under the treaty with that country, but was rejected by the other House, the late Lord Campbell saying that he would never admit such a departure from the principles upon which criminal justice was administered in this country.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that he held in his hand the treaty with France, and it was in all the points that had been mentioned exactly similar to that before the House. In the treaty under consideration, however, murder was much better defined than it was in that one. Here it was stated to comprehend assassination, parricide, and two other offences. [Mr. HENNESSY: Assassination?] He apprehended that the laws of no civilized country would say that "assassination" included the taking of life in an insurrection where the parties were openly and fairly in the field. The provisions of the French Treaty as to the production of convictions were precisely the same as those which were contained in this convention. In both cases, of course, it would be necessary that the magistrate should be satisfied not merely that the fugitive who was claimed had been convicted of an offence which was called murder, or whatever it might be, in the country from which he had fled, but that the offence of which he had been convicted was such as would have amounted to that crime in this country. The House must be satisfied that in carrying out the treaty which had been entered into with Prussia there would be no risk of our abandoning those safeguards of liberty which had in all similar cases been maintained in this country. It ought to be remembered that the administration of this law would be in the hands of the judges of the realm, who had always been most jealous of any extension of the interpretation of Acts of Parliament of this kind, and who would take care that the law of this country was not made instrumental to the surrender of persons as criminals for acts that would not in this country constitute the offences charged. He trusted that the House, having regard to the fact that this treaty had actually been entered into with Prussia, would not hesitate to give it its sanction.

Mr. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he begged to point out that there was a most extraordinary difference between the convention with France and that before the House, and the hon. and learned Gentleman, when he said that the cases were exactly similar was entirely in error. According to the clause of the Bill before them a fugitive convicted of crime might be given up on authentic proof of the conviction and identity of the party. Now, in the 6 & 7 Vict. there was not a word enabling this country to give up a person on certificate of conviction, on the ground that he had been convicted before. So far from the cases being identical, they were exactly the reverse. The treaties between England and France were the same as between England and Prussia; but Parliament had omitted the clause which was inserted in the present Bill. He should like to know what justification there was for putting into this Act a clause which had no effect between this country and other powers. The noble Lord had intimated that the treaty was the same, and that the Acts of Parliament were the same. Now, if any hon. Member could prove that the stipulations between this country and foreign countries were the same as in that case, he should be out of court; but he contended that the Bill proposed to give powers for the extradition of criminals which were not given in the case of France, and he for one was not disposed to extend the law in favour of Prussia.

MR. WHITE said, that when the Attorney General, with that eloquence by which he was characterized, had talked in glowing terms of English principles and English justice, he could not help thinking that the American term "bunkum" might with great propriety be applied to his speech. The fact was that the Bill before the House had nothing to do with English principles or English justice, but rather with Prussian law and Prussian injustice. Political offenders were frequently condemned in their absence by foreign courts as they termed it par contumace, as was the case with M. Mazzini, who if he had been a Prussian might be delivered up on the following day under the operation of the Bill at the request of the Prussian Ambassador. That being the nature of the measure, he should offer it all the opposition in his power, believing it, as he did, to be a flagrant and atrocious violation of the right of asylum which was the boast of this country.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he would point out that the treaty between England and France, to which the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald) had adverted, was not that which was at present in force. The treaty to which the hon. Gentleman referred was that of 1843; whereas there was one of 1852, to which an Act giving effect had been passed in 1853.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: As there appears to be some doubt about the treaties, I have no objection to the adjournment of the debate.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

EDUCATION—(INSPECTORS' REPORTS). RESOLUTION.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I rise, Sir, to ask this House to do an act of generosity and of justice. This House is one of the highest authorities in the realm. There is, technically speaking, no appeal from its decision. But if by circumstances it should have been led to do that which is not founded in justice, there is an appeal which I am sure must always be successful when made. We know that the approval of the House of Commons is one of the highest objects of ambition to every man

engaged in the service of the country; and we also know that its censure is felt most deeply by any man on whom it may happen to fall. I have said that, technically speaking, there is no appeal from the decision of this House, but there is, nevertheless, an authority to which, in reality, such an appeal can be made; and that authority is one which is always ready to hear everything that can be alleged in favour of the person wronged, and is always open to listen to the truth when stated, though the truth may be in opposition to its original belief and conviction. The authority to which I allude is the House itself. I am quite sure that if it can be shown to the House that the decision at which it may have arrived in any case, whether affecting an individual or a department, has been arrived at hastily, or without full consideration, or upon inadequate grounds, an appeal to its sense of justice can never be made in vain, and that it will always be ready to set right that which it may have done wrongly. On the 12th of April last there was a debate in this House, and a Resolution was proposed inculcating a right hon. Member as well as a Department of the Government. The right hon. Member is my right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), and the Department of the Government is the Committee of Council for Education. The noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil) moved a Resolution affirming that the Report of the Inspectors of Schools had been mutilated as produced to this House, that that mutilation had deprived the Reports of their proper value, and that the practice was at variance with the understanding on which those Inspectors were originally appointed. My right hon. Friend, feeling that in the course of the debate a question had arisen which, in his opinion, involved an imputation on his veracity, with a nice sense of personal honour, and at variance, I am bound to say, with the advice of his friends, tendered the resignation of his office, and took upon himself the censure which the Resolution implied. That being so, we thought the matter could not be allowed to rest there; and the decision of the House having been founded on a misconception, and on a want of sufficient explanation, we deemed it right that a Committee should be appointed to investigate the matter, and to ascertain on what grounds the Resolution had been proposed. I am not at all seeking to impugn the conduct of the noble Lord who moved the Resolution, or that of those Members who voted for and carried it. They acted on their honest and sincere conviction, though I think I can show that that conviction was founded on error. It was determined, at all events, that a Committee should be appointed; and our first Motion was that the Members of that Committee should be named in the usual way. We thought it essential that my right hon. Friend should serve on it; but he declined to do so, and we were unable to persuade him to retract the decision. The Committee were eventually nominated by the General Committee of Elections. That Committee met and made the Report which is in the hands of the House. Now, the Resolution of the 12th of April has been, in my opinion, entirely negatived by the Report, and, that being so, I propose to the House to rescind a Resolution at variance with the deliberate Report of a Committee so appointed. The Resolution passed by the House was to the effect that the Reports of the Inspectors of Schools were mutilated, and, therefore, were deprived of their value; but the Committee reported, as hon. Members are well aware, that, in point of fact, it was not correct to state, as was stated in the Resolution, that from those Reports was excluded everything that was unfavourable to the views of the Committee on Education, or that those things only were inserted which were in their favour. The Committee found that passages were admitted—some favourable to them and some unfavourable—that there was no partiality in that respect, and that a fair representation was given of the opinions of the Inspectors of Schools. The Committee say that disquisitions on matters not belonging to the cognizance of the Inspectors had been omitted, and that they think such omission was right and proper. They also say that such a supervision is essential to the working of the Committee of Council as it is now constituted. Therefore, the Report of the Committee appears to me entirely to exculpate my right hon. Friend and the Department to which he belonged from the charges which were implied by the Resolution of the 12th of April. I therefore propose to the House the Resolution which I now place in your hands—

“That this House, having considered the Report of the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the practice of the Committee of Council on Education with respect to the Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, is of opinion that the Resolution passed on the 12th day of April last, with reference to such Reports, ought to be rescinded, and the said Resolution is hereby rescinded.”

MR. HOWES: Sir, as Chairman of the Committee I should wish to say a few words on this Question. If it had come on at an earlier period of the evening I should have thought it my duty to go at some length into the matters connected with it, but at this time of night I cannot be expected to do so. In the first place, however, I trust sincerely that the House, although this Motion has been brought on at a late time of night, and at a late period of the Session, will not object to it on the ground of time, knowing as we do that the noble Lord is extremely limited as to time, and it being absolutely imperative that this question should be set at rest once and for ever. Whatever different opinions there may be on this point and on others which may arise in the course of the debate, I hope there will be no difference upon one on which the Committee were unanimous—that the personal honour of the right hon. Member for Calne is absolutely and entirely clear and untouched. If any doubt of the sort has existed in the mind of any man in or out of this House, I trust it will be set at rest henceforth and for ever. As to the conduct of his Department, it is quite clear that for many years it has exercised a censorship and control over the Reports of the Inspectors. The Committee found unanimously that such a power existed, and that it had existed for many years, and, moreover, that it had been exercised with fairness and without excessive strictness. The noble Lord has analyzed the terms of the Resolution to a certain extent. I should be unwilling to discuss the meaning of the word “mutilation.” The Committee considered that point. They refer to it in their Report, and they say that it must always be a matter of opinion whether the omission or alteration of any portion of a document has or has not an important bearing with reference to that which is admitted or is permitted to stand. The following words of the Resolution of the 12th of April are to the effect that there has been an exclusion of matter unfavourable to the views of the Department, and matter admitted which is favourable to them. If that is true, it is true to the letter, and yet the converse is also true; and if the converse be added to the Resolution it has no effect whatever, and becomes a caput mortuum. Then comes the point which is really at issue. The Resolution affirms that the censorship of the Reports is at variance with the understanding originally existing on the appointment of the Inspectors. It seems to me that this Question entirely depends upon this consideration—Is this body of men entirely under the control of the Department and under the orders of the Department, or is it a body of men absolutely independent of the Department? If it is a body independent of the Department, then, of course, any supervision or alteration of their Reports is a most improper proceeding; but if it is considered that the Inspectors are clearly officials of the Department and subordinate to its regulations, then, of course, no complaint can arise. The mistake—for so I must call it—appears to me to have arisen in this way: When the Committee of Council was originally formed, Parliament, no doubt, required information on various matters connected with education, and was anxious to receive not only facts, but opinions, however discordant, to assist the Department in hitting on some system of education which might be supported by the Government. That necessity for ascertaining these various opinions ceased in the course of a few years, when the system was established. Then the Reports became quite of a different character, it became no longer necessary to have this mass of opinions, and the Reports assumed their present character. It seems to me that the error of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil) originated here. I trust, however, that there will be no opposition to the Motion of the noble Viscount. I trust that the noble Lord the Member for Stamford and the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) whom I see opposite, and other hon. Members who supported the Resolution, will acquiesce cordially in the noble Lord's Motion for the rescinding of that Resolution. The Resolution of the 12th of April appears to me quite unsupported with facts, and I may say is entirely at variance with them. I do not see, indeed, how the Resolution can assist the views of the hon. Members to whom I have referred in the matter. Their views appear to me to be to reassert the right to receive from the Inspectors all the information they may choose to give, both as to matters of fact and matters of opinion. If that be their object they ought to proceed, not by a Resolution of this kind, but by an entirely different course. They ought to move for an inquiry in far more general terms; in some such terms, in fact, as those suggested by the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) when the appointment of the Committee was proposed, and which would have considerably extended the inquiry of the Committee. If such a Committee had been obtained, those who supported the Resolution of the 12th of April might have appeared before it to support their views; but I believe they would be far more free if they were relieved from the Resolution now standing on our books. Therefore, I cordially support the Resolution of the noble Lord.

MR. WALTER: Sir, I have no hesitation in saying at once that I have not the slightest desire or intention to oppose the Motion of the noble Lord, both because I think that the main object aimed at by the Resolution which it is now proposed to rescind has been fully attained by the inquiry, and also because I should be sorry to be guilty of want of respect towards the Committee, which, I think, was selected with great fairness, and which has also conducted the inquiry with great fairness, and whose Report, though I cannot concur to the full extent in the description of it given by the noble Lord—indeed, I should be disposed to take exception to some of his expressions—still points in the direction indicated by his Motion. The only thing I do complain of is, that the noble Lord should not have availed himself of the power which he might undoubtedly have exercised to give this Motion precedence over the Orders of the Day, so as to afford to many hon. Members who have been forced to quit the House from sheer exhaustion an opportunity of stating their opinions upon it. The Report states that the principle involved in the object of this inquiry, and in the Resolution of the 12th of April, is important. That is undoubtedly the case; and I may add that it has acquired an adventitious importance from the unfortunate circumstance to which that Resolution led—the resignation of my right hon. Friend the late Vice President of the Committee of Education—who, actuated by feelings most honourable to himself, but hardly called for, in my opinion, by the occasion, considered the Resolution to be a reflection on his personal honour. I never took that view of it myself, as my right hon. Friend well knows; and many hon. Gentlemen, whose authority my right hon. Friend would be the first to acknowledge, fully shared that opinion. It appears to me that this misunderstanding, as it is termed in the Report, was owing to the construction put upon the word “mutilation." I believe the word was chosen rather from the want of a better word than from any other reason; but it certainly never was intended by it to throw any personal reflection on my right hon. Friend. In fact, if instead of the word "mutilation" we had used the words by which is described the practice of the Department—of which I may say we knew nothing at the time—if the Resolution had said, "In the opinion of this House the practice of sending back to the Inspectors their Reports to be altered by them and brought into conformity with the Minute of 1861, &c.," instead of "the practice of mutilating," &c., it would equally have answered my purpose, and would have been strictly consistent with the fact. The question is, what really was the practice of the Department in the matter. It appears to be thought that the essence of the charges against the Committee of Council was their alleged practice of marking Reports; but I wish it to be distinctly understood that that is not a practice I should complain of. Nor should I object to the Department overhauling the Reports and exercising a kind of censorship over them. My right hon. Friend explained at great length, on several occasions, the history of the practice. He said it always had existed, but on one occasion a passage occurred in an Inspector's Report so wholly irrelevant and improper—a comparison between the state of chastity of Protestants and Catholics, or something of that sort—that the Minute of 1861 was framed. I am of opinion that such a Department could not be carried on without some degree of censorship over the Reports, and without the power of striking out irrelevant passages. But the gist of my complaint was that passages bearing on questions in controversy were unfairly struck out, and that the House had not the benefit of statements of fact made by the Inspectors within their own official experience. My right hon. Friend gave his own explanation of the practice of the Department. He stated that the reason which induced him to frame the Minute of 1861 was as follows:—

"The reason was my reluctance to strike out anything myself, as a matter of authority, from the Reports of the Inspectors. It appeared to me that it was a bad plan to strike anything out as a matter of authority, and then present the Report to Parliament, as the Report of the Inspector. I thought it might raise a controversy between the Inspector and the Office, and that he would say, as, I believe, in some cases he did say, that the context was interfered with by striking out portions, and that the meaning of what remained was altered. I preferred very much, and it seemed to me, and to Lord Granville, to be the better course, to make the Inspector his own censor, and to collect into one Minute, instead of into different Minutes, what it was necessary to say on the subject of the Inspectors' Reports; and, if an Inspector happened seriously to offend, to call his attention to it, and to leave him to alter the Report."

The practice therefore was, instead of striking out any passage in a Report, to send back the Report to the Inspector, with a notification that if he did not make it conform to certain instructions it would be suppressed. That, however, was more objectionable, as it seems to me, than marking the Report, and for an obvious reason. Here is a case in point. Mr. Watkins addressed a letter to the Committee of Council in the following terms:—

"I have the honour to return to you herewith the manuscript of my general Report for 1862, which I have received from you by this post, and to point out to you that, though it has been returned to me under the circular of August 27, 1862, no passage in it is marked as objectionable; I am therefore utterly at a loss to know what it is in my Report that is censured; I drew it up most carefully in conformity with your letter of instructions, and I believe that it is entirely both according to the spirit and the letter of that document; but I shall be most happy to consider any objections which may be pointed out to me and, if I can, conscientiously, alter the passages censured."

I do not know what satisfaction Mr. Watkins got on that occasion, for it is not mentioned. I suspect it was very little, because in answer to another question Mr. Lingen said that my right hon. Friend the Vice President "considered it part of the policy of the Minute to say to an Inspector, 'This is not a Report which we will print at the public expense.' If the Inspector said, 'Why?' there was no answer to that question; he was merely referred to his instructions." Again, in another part of his evidence, Mr. Lingen said—

"I should like to substitute the actual communications that passed between the Office and the Inspectors. Here is the Minute, stating what the Report ought to be; here is a Report sent in; here is the judgment of the Committee, that it does not conform to the Minute; the Inspector says, 'Why?' The answer is, that we do not consider it good policy or for the interests of the service to tell you; that was the course of things."

I ask the House whether there can be a more unfair way of dealing with these gentlemen than this, to send back their Reports unaltered, and when they inquire, "What is it that you object to?"—tell us, and we will revise it," to reply, "You must find that out for yourselves—we will not tell you; but if you do not make your Reports conform to the instructions we will not print them." That is the practice of the Department, and it is, I must say, as unsatisfactory and unpleasant a mode of transacting business with the Inspectors as anything one can possibly conceive. Such, then, being the existing practice, I wish to call the attention of the House to a statement in the Report of the Select Committee, to which I take exception, because it is at variance with fact—

"No objection," say the Committee, "is made to statements of facts observed by the Inspectors within the circle of their official experience, whatever may be their bearing on the policy of the Committee of Council."

The House will recollect that the question turned very much on the alleged suppression of a particular Report by Mr. Longueville Jones. My noble Friend opposite and myself at the time the Resolution was passed stated that, as we were then informed, a passage containing statements not of opinion, but of fact, was suppressed because it was deemed at variance with the policy of the Department. I have here the Report of Mr. Longueville Jones. Four passages in it are marked in pencil. It is treated as an exceptional case, and the Select Committee, I am sorry to say, endorse the statement. It is an exceptional case, just in the sense in which when a respectable young woman gets into a scrape that is called an exceptional case. It is a flagrant case. It is the distinct suppression, not of an opinion, but of a fact which had a direct bearing on a question on which the House had voted only a few months before, and in which I myself take a strong personal interest—I mean the question of the value of schoolmasters' certificates. It is said the Report was suppressed because it contained throughout an animus hostile to the Department. I must own I am at a loss, in looking over the Report, to discover the hostile spirit. I do not say it is a good Report—that is not the question, but I will leave the House to judge of its tone. The passages which are marked, and in which alone the hostility can be supposed to lurk, are these. The first passage relates to the excuses alleged to have been made by teachers and managers of schools for the bad reading, writing, and arithmetic complained of in their schools. The second passage contains a simple objection to the practice of granting money for school buildings. The third passage merely mentions that the writer had met with opinions and declarations from all quarters among teachers, but that it would be of no use stating what these opinions and declarations were. To the fourth passage I beg the attention of the House. It is as follows:—

"There are several notable examples, however, of admirable infant schools in Wales; and I beg leave to name that of Conway, as realizing, in my opinion, more than any other similar institution I ever saw, all the highest and best requisites and results connected with infant teaching. The schoolmistress is the best infant teacher in my district, admirably fitted for her duties in every respect, and deserving of the greater credit because she is not certificated, though she is aided by pupil-teachers."

Now if that is not a statement of fact I should like to know what is. I am bound to do my right hon. Friend the late Vice President the justice to say that he treated the passage as rather foolish, because he said it had no bearing on the subject, but as quite harmless, and such as would never have led him to think of condemning the Report. Mr. Lingen, however, saw a great deal of mischief in it. Mr. Lingen was asked—to which he replied,

"You thought the statement made was intended to harass the Department?"

"Yes. Taken with the rest it appeared to me to be a certain case picked out at a rather critical time of the discussion to show this—here is the best teacher of a particular class in my district who is not certificated."

No one can doubt that the passage was marked out because it stated the very kind of fact which I wanted to ascertain—namely, the case of a good school kept by an uncertificated master or mistress. I have contended all along that there are plenty of good schools conducted by uncertificated teachers. The object of the Department was to prove the contrary; and they had Reports stuffed full of cases to show how worthless uncertificated teachers were. Here, however, when an instance occurred of a school, held up to commendation, which was kept by an uncertificated schoolmistress, they would not allow the statement of that fact to appear, because it told against their side of the question and in favour of mine. It was a flagrant and foolish suppression of a fact, which would have done little harm to the Department if published, but which has done them great harm by its suppression. I have myself been exposed to some taunts in this matter. Mr. Longueville Jones was severely censured for "his disloyalty and baseness" in furnishing me with the Report. I protest, not only on constitutional, but on personal grounds, against any such imputation. I will not surrender my right as a Member of Parliament to receive any statement either of private grievance or of any matter affecting the public welfare from any official of the Government whatever. We are privileged men. I do not say that officials have a right to send letters to the newspapers, or to confide the secrets of their Departments to any persons; but in this House we are entitled to know what is going on, what abuses exist in Departments, what the opinions of the officials are. I have not used any of the information I received except in this House; and I will not allow charges of "disloyalty and baseness" to be made against my informant, or of improper violation of confidence against myself for what I did. Besides, I have another reason. Hon. Members will, perhaps, recollect that in 1862 a correspondence with Mr. Norris, one of the Government Inspectors, was forced on me—it was not courted, but, at the same time, it was not declined by me. Mr. Norris, the Inspector, endeavoured to dissuade me from proceeding with my Resolution, and entered into a correspondence with me, which he conducted in a fair and able manner. I did what I could to reply to his views; but the Committee of Council, thinking, I suppose, that Mr. Norris had the best of the argument, deemed the correspondence of sufficient importance to be laid before the House. Well, I ask, is one Inspector to be allowed to write to me, with the sanction of the Department who lay the correspondence on the table, because they think it supports their position, and is another Inspector to be prohibited from communicating to me materials which strengthen my case? That is a position which any Member of this House will see at once is most unreasonable. I shall not at this hour (one o'clock) trouble the House with any further statement on this case. I would only say, in conclusion, that I think this whole inquiry will have been of very great service to the country. I hope it will make the Privy Council Office somewhat more cautious, and lead them to understand that the country is not disposed to submit to be ridden too hard by the Gentlemen at the head of that Department. You may be quite sure that if the Privy Council system is to work at all, it must be made to work harmoniously with the great body of school managers in this country. I assure the Department that, so far from caring for its assistance, I should have no objection myself to see its whole system swept away; for I think the education of the country could go on perfectly well without it. But I say that, if the system is to continue, it must be made more applicable than it is now to the wants of the community, and it cannot be made more simple and more applicable to those wants as long as it is clogged by the existing conditions and restrictions. With these remarks I do not oppose the rescinding of the Resolution. I do not wish to cast any censure upon the Department, and still less upon my right hon. Friend who then had charge of it; and if it be necessary I shall support this Motion.

Mr. F. S. POWELL said, he was unable to concur with the hon. Member for East Norfolk (Mr. Howes) in thinking that although at the earliest stages of the present system of education it was desirable that the Inspectors should act with entire independence and afford the fullest information, yet that we had now arrived at another era in the history of the movement when the Inspectors should not be free agents, and report according to their own discretion, but should only be the mere instruments and servants of the Department, expressing the opinions of the Committee of Privy Council only, and not their own. The Report of the Committee had been so lately circulated, that he did not think the House was acquainted with a letter dated August, 1863. It was stated in the Report that the House was aware of the system that had been pursued, the real fact being that neither the House nor the country was aware of that system until that Report was published. It had been generally supposed that a certain censorship was exercised over the Inspectors' Reports, but that something of freedom was nevertheless allowed them, and that they were permitted to express opinions contrary to the judgment and practice of the Department. But in the letter of August, 1863, the Inspectors were informed that their practical suggestions for the improvement of the schools in their respective districts must be consistent with the existing Minutes, and the principle sanctioned by Parliament. Nothing had been allowed to appear in the Reports for that year which was contrary to the Minutes of Council. Take the case of the Factory Inspectors. One of those Inspectors recommended, the year before last, certain alterations in the factory system of Scotland, requiring a change in the law to carry them out; and the Government introduced a Bill to give effect to his suggestion. Now, if a Factory Inspector was permitted to do that, why should not a School Inspector be permitted to make a suggestion, even although it might militate against some particular Minute of Council having indeed, in a certain degree, the sanction of Parliament, but certainly not having the force of law? He could not admit that entire impartiality had been shown in the exercise of that censorship. In a former year Mr. Watkin's Report complained of a change made in regard to having Inspectors and assistant Inspectors, and his Report was suppressed. Then there was Mr. Norris's case, which had been referred to by the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter). He would not weary the House by quoting the evidence taken before the Committee at that hour of the night, but if any hon. Member would carefully consider it, he would find that there had been an excision of facts and opinions unfavourable to the views of the Department, while facts and opinions favourable to those views had been inserted.

LORD ROBERT CECIL: Sir, I am sorry that the noble Lord the Member for the East Riding of Yorkshire (Lord Hotham) is not here, because I think he would have informed us that it was not the unanimous opinion of the Committee that, as the hon. Chairman has stated, any time however late, any day however late in the Session, is a fitting one for bringing this Motion forward. [Mr. HOWES: No!] I understood the hon. Member to express a hope that there would be no protest from any part of the House as to time; because, whatever might be the time, this matter ought to be disposed of this Session. I think the noble Lord the Member for the East Riding would have shown that there are members of the Committee who would not agree in that opinion. This Question, Sir, consists of two parts—the one a personal part, and the other a matter of policy. I thought that the noble Lord at the head of the Government carefully confined himself to the personal part of the Question, and if I am right in that impression, and am to understand him as merely wishing to clear the right hon. Gentleman the late Vice President of the Education Department from the shadow of anything reflecting upon his veracity, then I have no objection to join the noble Lord in his Resolution; but, if he wishes, at this late period of the Session, and at this late hour of the night, to ask the House to commit itself to a reversal of the decision on a question of policy to which it came deliberately in the middle of the Session, then I can only enter my protest against a proceeding which seems to me highly unconstitutional and improper. But I gathered from the expressions of the noble Lord that he desired to confine himself strictly to the personal aspect of the question. [Viscount PALMERSTON signified assent.] I have from the first done all in my power to remove what seemed to me the extreme misapprehension of the late Vice President of the Education Office, that there was any intention on the part of any person in this House to cast any personal reflection upon him. With regard to the Committee of Council, I cannot extend to them the same complete exculpation as to the wisdom and entire fairness of their proceedings, but still I am perfectly willing to admit that they were actuated by right intentions, and I certainly do not mean to oppose this Motion. But as respects the matter of policy, I beg that my conduct on this occasion may not be misunderstood. I do not admit that the Committee of Privy Council have a right to mutilate or cut to pieces—call it what you like—these Inspectors' Reports. I do not agree that they have the right so to alter or cause to be altered the Reports intended for the use of this House as to change their meaning. I contend that the Committee of Council have no right to alter any document—that no Department has a right to alter any document that is placed before us, without saying at the same time, on the face of such document, that it is not the true original production of the person whose name it bears, but has been dealt with by the Department through which it has passed. That seems to me not only to be a principle essential to the proper conduct of any public office, but an elementary principle of morality. I trust that on a future occasion the House will go further and deeper into this matter—that the whole question of the Inspectors' Reports may be inquired into by a Committee familiar with educational subjects, and that we may come to some decision as to the extent and nature of the censorship which may be exercised in these cases. That irrelevant matter should be excluded I freely admit; but I cannot admit that argumentative matter—that is, matter which differs from the opinions of their superiors on questions of policy—I cannot admit that that is rightly excluded from these Reports. At all events, wherever it has been excluded, hon. Members of this House who read the Reports ought to be warned that that species of censorship has been exercised. There is much in the Report of the Committee which I should have wished to criticize if the hour had not been so late; but I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) at the earliest period in the next Session intends to ask for a Committee of Inquiry into the whole constitution of the Committee of Council. That may be a fitting opportunity of reviewing these proceedings and of inquiring into the nature of the practices which that Committee have really adopted—that may be a fitting opportunity of also answering the observations which have been made by the hon. Member for East Norfolk (Mr. Howes), which I could not answer now without detaining the House at an inconvenient length. I will only add that I hope I may not be held by my silence on this occasion to have assented to principles which I cannot admit.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House, having considered the Report of the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the practice of the Committee of Council on Education with respect to the Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, is of opinion that the Resolution of the 12th day of April last, with reference to such Reports, ought to be rescinded, and the said Resolution is hereby rescinded.

CIRCASSIANS (TURKEY).

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, that he rose to move for papers relating to the immigration into Turkey of Circassian exiles. A great amount of suffering had been caused by the proceedings of the Russian authorities in Circassia, owing to the great miseries and suffering entailed upon an immense number of the unfortunate natives of the Caucasus. The course pursued in that quarter seemed to be but a portion of the policy of the Russian Government towards rebellious or resistant races. In Poland the same course had been pursued, and the Poles had been forbidden to hold any land in Lithuania. The object of Russia appeared to be to get rid of every people opposed to her rule, and to replace them with the pure Russian race.

In short, everything pointed to a revival of that policy, which rendered her an object of so much alarm some time since. He would also remind the House that England had a great interest in the subject, besides the general one of humanity, as Russia was employing her resources in extending her power eastward.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copy of further Papers showing what steps are being taken by the Turkish Government relating to the Immigration of Circassians into Turkey."—(Mr. Henry Seymour.)

MR. KINNAIRD said, he was glad that the subject had been brought before the House, as a great and lasting feeling existed against the proceedings of the Russian Government, by the course it had pursued with regard to the gallant race of the Caucasus.

MR. LAYARD said, he quite agreed in the opinion which had been expressed of the great crime which had been committed by Russia. The Turkish Government had behaved with great humanity. The Sultan had subscribed £50,000 from his own privy purse for the relief of the poor refugees. There was some difference as to their numbers, one account describing them at 100,000, another at 300,000. The probability was they numbered about one-half. The Russian Government had done nothing beyond placing at their disposal three or four vessels. The British Government had given every assistance in their power, by furnishing transports, and sending a large amount of biscuits. With regard to papers, he had none that he could produce at present.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

COMMITTEE. THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, this Bill effected some improvement in the law relating to judgments which he had himself in vain endeavoured to accomplish, and, therefore, he could not find fault with the measure. But he had never attempted more than to protect bond fide purchasers or mortgagees against judgments. But one clause of the Bill took away the right of every judgment creditor as against the property of the debtor, unless and until he actually sued out execution upon his judgment. That, in his opinion, was not expedient, and very unwise. There was another provision of the Bill which was of the utmost importance. By the law as it at present stood execution could not issue upon any judgment so as to affect the land until twelve months after judgment had been obtained; but under the provisions of this Bill the son of a tenant for life of an estate, who was entitled to the remainder, and who might, as eldest sons had done before, and most probably would do again, be desirous of anticipating his inheritance; he might go to a Jew money lender, who would advance him money, the borrower giving him a judgment on his interest in the estate; and by this Bill the creditor, the moment he obtained that judgment, might sell the reversion, and thus the property of the youth might pass from him for a very inadequate consideration. It might be said, that with the quickness with which business was now transacted in Chancery this might be effected under a mortgage. But the answer was, that a mortgage was a contract. He considered this a very important measure, and would have divided the House upon it if he had been in a position to do so.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the Bill and every clause of it had been carefully considered by a Select Committee, and every noble and learned Lord who was a member of that Committee, except his noble and learned Friend, had approved it.

House in Committee accordingly.

An Amendment made; Standing Orders, Nos. 37 and 38 considered, and dispensed with; Amendment reported.

Bill read 3^a, with the Amendment, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH rose, pursuant to Notice, to call the attention of the House to the Changes which have taken place in the State of Foreign Affairs since Parliament met, and said, my Lords, I avail myself of this opportunity, which is almost the last which will be afforded before the prorogation of Parliament, to draw your Lordships' attention to the great change which has taken place in Foreign Affairs since we met in February—a change affecting not merely the integrity of the Danish dominions, which almost every State in Europe a few years ago thought of great importance to the balance of power and the interests of peace, but affecting also the sacredness of the obligations of treaties by which all the States of Europe are bound together—affecting the security of all the smaller and weaker States which may dread the aggression of neighbouring Powers, and, above all, affecting that steady progress of constitutional government on the Continent of Europe, which for several years we have witnessed with so much sympathy and satisfaction. I confess I rise to address your Lordships now with very different feelings from those by which I was animated when I addressed you on more than one previous occasion this Session on the subject of Foreign Affairs. I then had some hope of doing good. I have now no such hope, and I speak only because I think it right to endeavour to lay the actual state of affairs before this House and the country. I then appealed to the higher and nobler feelings of Parliament and the nation, believing as I did that a course which was dictated by generosity was also recommended by policy. Others, with more success, appealed to more common feelings—to love of ease, to love of repose, to love of quiet, but, above all, to that love of money, which is now become the engrossing passion of the people of this country. My Lords, Her Majesty's Government declared that they would afford no assistance whatever to Denmark in her difficulties, after the Conference was at an end. At the commencement of the Session, Her Majesty's Opposition stated that it was not their business to find a Foreign policy, although they did not appear to disregard the obligations of finding a civil policy. Having declined, however, to find a Foreign policy, they saw fit to adopt the policy of the Government, and declared that they too were not prepared to give assistance to Denmark, while they condemned at the same time in the strongest terms the conduct of the Government throughout the course of the negotiations. I regret, my Lords, this decision of the two great parties which divide this House and the State, but I am convinced it would be idle to seek to force any opinion of mine on a reluctant House and a determined Ministry. I must, however, say that in looking back to the past, I do not think the policy now so generally adopted would have been adopted by any one of the great Ministers of former times whom history delights to honour; nor can I find in all our history more than one reign in which this policy would have been congenial to a Government, and that was the reign of King James I., when the noble Earl opposite might have carried out his policy of abstinence from war with the cordial favour of his Sovereign. There was, however, in those days a great man who thought differently. I recollect a passage in a work of one of the greatest of mankind—Bacon—who in his Moral and Political Essays, which contain perhaps more wisdom than any uninspired book, says, "Let no State expect to be great that is not awake upon any just occasion of arming." That he, great moralist as he was, believed to be the true principle of public conduct. But see in what a state Denmark is now. She lies prostrate at the feet of her unscrupulous enemies. She is without fortresses; she is weak and has no one to defend her, unless it be the Emperor of France, who perhaps at this moment may come forward on her behalf. At the commencement of the Session, Denmark stood in the position in which she was placed after the Congress of Vienna. She was shorn of the prestige and honour of her ancient glory—greatly through our means—by the destruction of one of her fleets, and the carrying away of another, and by the loss of Norway, which had been given to conciliate Sweden during the great war. But she was still in possession of the ancient provinces which she had held for 400 years, and which she would have continued to possess but for the intrigues of the Germans. Consider, my Lords, by what steps the enemies of Denmark proceeded. The German Confederation first decided on the Execution in Holstein, and based it mainly, if not entirely, latterly, upon certain Royal Letters Patent issued by the late King on the 30th of March last year. But before that Execution commenced, those Letters Patent had been withdrawn, so that the ground of their proceeding was entirely cut from under the feet of the Diet. Within less than three weeks after the Federal Execution commenced, Austria and Prussia appeared on the scene as substantive parties, not as members of the German Confederation, and proceeded to occupy Schleswig as a material guarantee for the execution of certain diplomatic arrangements made in 1852. Among those arrangements was this, that Denmark should do nothing that could even tend to the union of Schleswig with Denmark. The act of the 18th of November, which was especially complained of, made little or no change in the relations which had existed between Schleswig and Denmark from the year 1858. In that year, Holstein, which had before been represented in the Parliament of Denmark, was withdrawn from it in consequence of objections taken by the German Confederation. Schleswig, however, remained, without any objection on the part of Germany until this period of 1863, when it was first stated that this measure, which added little to the connection between Schleswig and Denmark, was contrary to the arrangements of 1852. During the whole time that that Act of November was discussed in the Parliament of Denmark, no objection was made by the German Powers until the last two or three days; indeed, it was supposed that the measure was in entire conformity with their desire. That measure of November 18 contained one provision, however, which was undoubtedly a contravention of the arrangements of 1852. It contained a provision for extending the electoral law of Denmark to the province of Schleswig. The Germans, no doubt, had reason to expect that that would not be done; but they never openly objected to it. They did not wish to put forward their desire to prevent the progress of liberal and popular government as their reason for declaring war; but their reason it was. It was admitted by M. Bismark; and Austria and Prussia desired the King, on pain of instant war, of his own authority, after the dissolution of his Parliament, to annul that Act, which he could not constitutionally do; which he could not do without violating his oath. M. Bismark coolly suggested that if the King could not constitutionally repeal that Act he might declare a state of siege, and then he could do anything—anything, no doubt, in crime, but nothing in rectitude. If the King had acted on that suggestion he would undoubtedly have deserved dethronement, and he would have lost the character not only of an honest monarch, but of an honest man. War was declared, and the Germans entered Schleswig. That was the second passage of this war. They had not been there long before they took steps, under a mere pretext, to invade Jutland. Austria at first evidently had strong objections to the occupation of Jutland, but she was induced to accede to the desire of Prussia, and Jutland was soon occupied as well as Schleswig. Now, my Lords, what do these various successive steps prove? What I infer from them is, that this war between Denmark and Germany did not begin uno intuitu; that there was no original plan to do what they have done and what they are doing; but that, seeing the impunity which was granted to them, seeing that no opposition was made to their first, second, and third steps, they went on further in wrong and stand thus where they are now. The other day there was some conversation about a Holy Alliance, and it was said that there was no Holy Alliance, nor any probability of one. There may not be, I dare say, any Treaty of Holy Alliance, nor should I attach much importance to it if there were; for I consider that when the Powers of Europe tore to pieces the Treaty of 1852, they tore to pieces all treaties and destroyed all their authority. If the Powers had agreed to a Treaty of Holy Alliance, they would stand by it just as long as was convenient to them, and no longer. But, although I believe there is not a Treaty of Holy Alliance, there is an understanding—not a holy understanding—an understanding which seems to me to be worse than a Holy Alliance. The Holy Alliance was a combination of Princes who bearing in mind the French Revolution, then recently terminated, and all its disastrous consequences, saw danger in every movement of the people to force new Constitutions on their Sovereigns, and who, widely differing from us, who revere Magna Charta, and look back with pride on the events which led to King William coming to this country, determined to avert the dangers they apprehended by suppressing all the institutions which were thus forced on Sovereigns. But while they committed these acts of hostility to public liberty they had at least honour among themselves. They adhered to their words—they declared that they would not carry their intervention further than the necessity of the case, and that they would only occupy a country until things were put into their former position. They declared that they had no views of self-aggrandizement, no desire for the acquisition of territory, and that they would leave the dominions of the assisted King as soon as the necessity was passed; and so they did—nor did they exercise any undue rigour in enforcing the payment of their expenses. I believe the debt owing by France to Spain for the expenses of the Spanish expedition to be not yet paid, so that it does not appear that there has been any heavy financial pressure on Spain, nor was there on Naples. But these German princes, who have arrived at an understanding hostile to liberty, carry their principles much further. They prohibit the action of the King of Denmark, in conjunction with his Parliament, to extend the electoral franchise to the people of Schleswig. They even propose to take altogether from the King of Denmark the province to which, in concert with his Parliament, he desired to give a more popular constitution. That is going much further than was ever attempted by the Powers connected with the Holy Alliance. I am not surprised that these Sovereigns, proceeding in this manner, were disposed to think that they might go on with impunity. The noble Earl did not conceal that it was his opinion, and that of the Government, that no assistance should be afforded to Denmark. There were other things besides the declarations of Ministers upon the subject which instructed the German Powers yet more clearly and significantly as to the course we intended to pursue. Within a few days of the commencement of the Session the Naval and Military Estimates were laid on the table. They contained a reduction, not a large one, both in our naval and military strength. Economy was to be the order of the day; it was thought necessary to show a balance and to get that small balance our naval and military strength was reduced. But not merely was there this reduction, but the Estimates were ostentatiously declared to be Peace Estimates. There could be no mistake about it; it was quite clear from their conduct, as well as their declarations, that Ministers intended to stand by without giving any assistance to Denmark. It would be most unreasonable if we were to demand that a British Minister should succeed in all he undertakes, or that he should always get what he asks for. But I think we are entitled to demand from a British Minister that he shall not adopt a course which renders success in his negotiations impossible. That, I think, is a just demand. But when the noble Earl, or any other negotiator, enters into negotiations by making it distinctly understood that, however much he may be defeated in his propositions, he will not lift his arm to enforce them, and that in no case will he resort to war, he at once loses all his strength. Diplomacy is armed reason. It is not pure reason; if it were, the Ministers of Portugal, of Greece, and of the Pope would have as much influence in a Conference as the Ministers of the great Powers of Europe. But the strength of Powers in a Conference is the strength they have behind them, and if they declare that they will never use that strength they might as well have none. They would be in the disagreeable position which would have been occupied by a gentleman in Dublin about the time of the Union, if he had made it publicly known that he intended never to fight, and had then gone about interfering in the business of everybody, and saying the most unpleasant things in the most disagreeable way. I leave to the judgment of the House what would have been the influence of that gentleman in society. No doubt he would have been continually insulted until he would have been compelled to violate his own resolution and fight at a time when, perhaps, he was least prepared. My Lords, I consider it of the deepest importance and the most dangerous import, that in the Conference the neutral Powers of Europe should have decided on not regarding the Treaty of 1852 as the basis of their proceedings. I can see nothing whatever—I can see no change of circumstances—which could have justified a departure from the obligations of that treaty; and the only excuse I can find for it is this—that it is now said to be established, that nations are to decide who shall be their governors. But, my Lords, the application of that rule to the present case of Schleswig-Holstein is a complete fallacy. When a great homogeneous people declare by a vast majority in favour of any particular form of government, no doubt it is just that their will should prevail. The Duke of Wellington, in recognizing that principle, rendered to this country and to Europe as great an act of civil service as he ever performed. When the French people put aside Charles X., the Duke of Wellington at once recognized the new Government; but no injury was done to Europe by acknowledging the change of rulers decided on by the French people. Depend upon it, whether a Bourbon, a Member of the House of Orleans, or a Bonaparte sits on the Throne of France, there will be little or no difference in the conduct of the French Government as regards Foreign policy. The French people will impress their character on the Government, and it matters little to the world at large who may be at the head of that nation; but it is a different thing when the people of Holstein say, “We desire to separate ourselves from the country with which we have been so long united.” They may desire that; but they cannot give effect to their wish without disturbing the balance of power in every part of Europe, and, as they owe a duty to Europe, the substitution of one Sovereign for another in Schleswig-Holstein becomes a question for the European Powers. Again, ought we not to consider this matter with reference to the binding power of treaties generally? Because, if this new principle of dealing with treaties is sanctioned, the more ancient a treaty is, the longer it has been established among the laws of Europe, the less, in point of fact, may be the justification for its continuance. I see in this very great danger; for what is a precedent to-day will be a rule to-morrow, and there will be no security left except in strength for the preservation of anything. But, my Lords, observe how dangerous it is to permit a small and weak State to be overcome, spoliated, and dismembered by the coalition of great and powerful States, no one assisting her or endeavouring to arrest the blow. There is not one of the weak States of Europe which may not feel her security greatly impaired by what has occurred in Denmark. If the two great German Powers, without being interfered with by the neutral Powers, may take possession of Schleswig and Holstein, and plunder Denmark as they will, what security is there that when they have obtained possession of Kiel for a naval station Prussia may not get up a quarrel with Holland about Limbourg and Luxembourg, for the purpose of obtaining the port of the Texel? The same consideration applies to a weaker State, Belgium. What is to prevent France from moving on Belgium and obtaining possession of the ports on the Scheldt? My Lords, this question of Denmark is the question of Sweden, of Holland, of Belgium. It is the question of all the smaller and weaker States of Europe; and the ruin which is now, without any attempt to prevent it, brought upon Denmark will terrify all the smaller States, and destroy altogether their feeling of independence. More than all, my Lords, I look on this movement of Prussia and Austria as more particularly a demonstration of the despotic Powers against the growing freedom of Germany and the spread of constitutional principles. We know the position of the King of Prussia and his Parliament before the commencement of hostilities in Denmark. We know also how things went on in Austria, though there they were better and there was much more hope; but no one who reads the papers on the Danish

Question—no one who has watched the progress of Affairs in Europe—can doubt that this was, I will not say a well laid, but a wickedly laid plan to destroy the liberties of the people of Denmark, and likewise to destroy the liberties of the people of Prussia and Austria. I dread this, not because it is a thing which will last—not because its authors will continue to enjoy an immunity from punishment—but because some few months ago I saw the steady and tranquil flow of a fertilizing stream which would have passed through the whole of those territories bringing peace and happiness to the people. Their rulers have thrown up a dam against it; for a time that dam will prevent its flow; but before very long it will burst over its bounds, and, sweeping onwards with the violence of an avalanche, it will destroy those who attempt to restrain it. It is because the things that are being done cannot be done without bringing after them a retribution—a terrible retribution—I now speak with so much alarm of the course which Prussia and Austria have been permitted to take. I think we cannot disguise from ourselves that there is in those transactions something behind more dangerous than that which we see. There is a mystery we cannot fathom. We cannot give any reasonable explanation of the conduct of Russia and France. What, then, must be our course? We must look to ourselves—we must consolidate our own strength—improving in every way our national defences not only in fortifications, but in our land forces, regular and irregular, and also in our navy. We must also endeavour to be, as we ought always to be, on the best understanding with France; but, at all events, I hope we shall yet revive the ancient spirit of this country, which did not consider lucre to be the only great good, but ever had regard to honour and the justice of the cause it espoused. Vice and crime seem now to stalk unchallenged from one end of Europe to the other. Does history record so cruel an edict as that which has driven the Circassians from their homes without any assistance on the part of the Government that has consigned them to banishment? Does history record an instance of a people so trodden under foot as the Poles have been in recent times? Women, children, and old men and young men, the hope and glory of their families, mercilessly exiled—apparently on the principle that the best man is the best exile—forced to travel on foot from Warsaw to Siberia, many dying on the road, and those who survive destined on their arrival to a life of slavery. When we see, besides, this act of wrong to Denmark—Prussia and Austria proceeding after their own requisitions have been complied with—marching from one excess to another, till they have appropriated to themselves a large portion of an ancient country—my Lords, when I see such flagrant offences against right and justice, such reckless provocations of Providence, I feel that they cannot go on without a decided chastisement and retribution; and I only pray that we who have not taken a part in this dreadful wrong—that those who have not participated in it—may, by the Divine mercy and permission, be exempted from the punishment; and that, if it is to come, it may only be inflicted upon those who have designed, and those who have been employed in perpetrating the crime.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, the noble Earl has spoken with his usual ability and eloquence on a very important subject; but he has admitted in the beginning of his speech that he does not agree with the Government nor with the Opposition; and he might have added that he does not agree with the country. I shall not pretend to enter at any length upon the subject, seeing that it has already been fully debated in both Houses of Parliament, and they have expressed their decisions with regard to it; but there are some of the statements of the noble Earl which appear to me to require so much correction in order to reduce them to the actual state of facts, that I cannot altogether avoid noticing them. The noble Earl throughout spoke of Denmark as if it was a country of a homogeneous population, which had been invaded by two great Powers for the purpose of wresting away from it some portion of its territory. Now, the difficulty of this question throughout has been that, while Denmark is a small country, it is inhabited by two different races, and the one possessing the capital and seat of power, and controlling the government of the whole country, is at issue with the other race which occupied certain of its provinces. But there was another difficulty still, and a complication beyond this—namely, that while the majority could exercise, unjustly and oppressively if they chose, their power over the minority, that minority had the opportunity of appealing to a nation on their frontier, containing more than 40,000,000 of inhabitants, whose feelings, passions, and sympathies were with the minority.

In that situation of affairs the great Powers of Europe made a treaty, which I took the liberty on a former occasion of styling an artificial treaty. It was the best thing that could at that time be done; but it depended for its favourable operation on the temper, moderation, and good sense of those who had the rule in Denmark, as well as of the other parties. It must be remembered that at the beginning of the contest in 1848, when Prussia invaded the Danish provinces, and when Austria likewise appealed to arms, those Powers only retired from the territory of the King of Denmark after obtaining engagements by which they were justified in interfering in the internal government of Holstein and Schleswig. They were justified in interfering in regard to Holstein by the general law of the Germanic Confederation, and in Schleswig by those special engagements made in 1851. When, therefore, during eleven years there were disputes and discussions between Denmark and the Germanic Confederation, the other Powers, parties to the Treaty of 1852, who were bystanders in this disturbance, were obliged to ask themselves whether Denmark was entirely blameless in the matter, and whether she had fulfilled all the promises she had made. For my part, having thought it my duty to look into this subject, I could neither say that the Government of Denmark were blameless, nor that they had fulfilled all the promises by which they had bound themselves to the Germanic Confederation and to Austria and Prussia. Therefore the question came to this—that the other Powers would not have been justified in purely and simply defending Denmark; for while they held up the right hand to defend Denmark, it would have been necessary for them with the left to compel her to fulfil her promises, to govern according to her engagements, and treat her German subjects with the same fairness and justice as her Danish subjects were treated. Therefore, the question was in itself extremely complicated, and no one could say that in going to war for Denmark purely and simply and without demanding anything from Denmark, an entirely right course would be taken. This appears to me to be the difficulty of the question. It was not a question whether you should go to war or not. You could not draw the sword without being convinced that you were in the right. If you are to go to war and to ask the people of England to contribute large subsidies for carrying on the war, let the people at least be sure you are fighting in the right cause. When I say that Denmark did not stand perfectly upright in this matter, I by no means intend to take the part of the German Powers against any of the accusations made against them by the noble Earl. I think, and I have always said, that if they had been willing to submit this matter to the decision of those Powers of Europe not so immediately concerned as themselves—if the parties on both sides had listened to fair terms—this question might have been settled by negotiation. But, unfortunately, while Denmark had for eleven years continually and persistently put herself in the wrong, Germany at length determined to listen to no reason, to accept no promises of redress, and hastened on to war, resolved to settle the question by the arbitrament of arms. I thought that that conduct was not the result of the real judgment of Austria and Prussia, but that it was a means, perhaps, by which they sought, together or separately, to obtain the popular feeling in Germany in their favour; and it was rather to content that feeling, than because they thought their cause was right or their actions in accordance with their professions, that the war was precipitated on. Now, I do not mean to discuss the question which the noble Earl has raised, that though France and Russia refused to be our partners, we should ourselves have interposed, and by our own means have defended Denmark. That question has been discussed already in both Houses of Parliament, and I hold in my hand the Resolution arrived at in the House of Commons on the subject, and the Address which that House presented to Her Majesty, after a discussion, I think, of four nights. The other House, which is the only constitutional body to which, in case of war, an appeal could be made for the means of carrying on the war, after thanking Her Majesty for laying before them the papers on the question, and expressing regret that the Conference was brought to a close without accomplishing the important purposes for which it assembled, went on to express the satisfaction with which they learnt that at this conjuncture Her Majesty had been advised to abstain from interfering in the war between Denmark and Germany. It is, therefore, clear, that if the Government had called on the Commons for the means of carrying on war, in which, as I have said, France and Russia refused to take part, the House of Commons would not have supported the Government. The noble Earl supposes that in the course pursued the honour of England has been neglected. I ask in what respect has the honour of England been in any way involved in this contest? Is it the case that you had a treaty by which you were bound to assist Denmark? No such treaty exists, neither is there any obligation of honour which compels to involve ourselves in war for the sake of Denmark. I am fully convinced that if ever a case should arise in which the honour of this country requires war, you would have the House of Commons deciding, not by a small majority, but by overwhelming numbers, to support any obligations involving the honour of the country. My Lords, the noble Earl has spoken of the effect which the war in Schleswig and Holstein may have upon the liberties of Germany, and the constitutional question in Prussia. Well, it is quite true that there has been for a considerable time a contest going on between the Crown and the House of Commons in Prussia with regard to points which vitally concern the constitutional liberties of that country. It would almost seem that we might repeat now what Mr. Burke said in that most eloquent speech of his delivered ninety years ago on the pacification of America. Speaking at that time of the contest in America, he said, "Slavery is a weed that grows anywhere. They may have it in Spain, they may have it in Prussia." Now one would be loth to think that the people of Prussia in the course of those ninety years have not learned both to love and to value or to understand liberty. My belief is that neither on the part of the Crown, on the part of the House of Lords, or on the part of the House of Commons of Prussia, have they yet arrived at a complete understanding of that complex machine called a Constitutional Monarchy. I do believe, however, that the spirit of liberty exists in Prussia, that it exists throughout Germany, and that it requires no aid and no assistance from us. But after this question of Denmark has been decided, as it will be decided, without any interference on our part, I believe the best prospect of seeing liberty and constitutional monarchy established in Germany will be to leave that brave and intelligent people to settle for themselves the differences which may exist between them and their Sovereign, and there is no need that England should in any way interfere in the settlement of that dispute.

I am far from thinking, if we compare the state of things now with what it was fifty years ago, at the time of the Treaty of 1815, or with what it was forty years ago in 1821 and 1823, at the time of the Holy Alliance, that the people of Europe have not made great progress in the study of political questions. I believe that that which was possible for the Sovereigns of Europe in 1823, that which was possible for the Sovereign of France at that time, when he put down the Cortes of Spain, and established absolute monarchy there, would not be possible now. I believe that no Sovereign who reads the signs of the times would attempt any such thing. On the contrary, I believe that the Sovereigns will find it to be their interest to make such an agreement with their subjects that constitutional monarchy will in time prevail in all the countries of Europe. That is my belief; and I am far from thinking that if we had rushed into war, and the States of Europe had been pitted against each other in a bloody contest, we should have promoted the cause of liberty any more than we should have promoted the cause of peace. I believe, on the contrary, that by leaving it to the people and the Sovereigns of Germany to settle their differences among themselves, we have done not only that which is good for the honour and interests of England, but that which is best for the interests of Europe at large.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE RED. CLIFFE: My Lords, I cannot allow the speech of my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary to pass without making a few observations. My noble Friend appears to me to have taken up a position somewhat unfortunate, for while he opened his speech by saying that he found no reasons which would have justified us in taking up arms on behalf of Denmark, he proceeded to condemn in the strongest terms the conduct of the Powers who were the other parties to that conflict. My noble Friend (Earl Russell) then asked where we can find anything to justify the observation that the honour of England has been sacrificed in these negotiations. I humbly conceive, my Lords, that the question is not a question of the honour of England, but of the management of affairs; and, I must say, with all deference to my noble Friend, and with all due consideration for the difficulties with which he has had to contend, and for the questions which he has justly described as of so delicate and complicated a nature, comparing the result with the objects to be obtained, the disappointment of the public has been fully justified. The great object which I understood the Government to have in view was to maintain peace in the North of Europe. Well, we had not peace, but war. We are told that the treaty which provided for the integrity and independence of Denmark was to be maintained. That treaty has been given up by the English Government itself. And so through every phase of the negotiations we find the same unfortunate contradictions between the objects sought and the results brought about. Hopes have been raised, and have been disappointed. We went into a Conference without a basis, and consequently without a chance of success. And what was the end? Total failure. Putting all these things together, it seems impossible not to perceive that there is too much justification for the impression that we have incurred a certain amount of discredit. And such, unfortunately, has been the case on several occasions within the last two years. It is not only with regard to Denmark that we have incurred discredit, but also in the negotiations with Russia last year on the affairs of Poland. I will not unnecessarily go over ground which has been so often trodden before—it will be sufficient if I ask your Lordships to call to mind the circumstances under which we entered into negotiations with respect to Poland, and to compare them with the circumstances under which we abandoned her. The Poles in the end were left in a situation far worse than they would have been in had they been left to their own independent efforts. We had then the advantage of the co-operation of Austria in conjunction with France. Austria has since taken a different course, and we have reason to apprehend that it is in consequence of the policy which we then adopted. Then with respect to that much-vexed question, the proposal of a Congress by France—what we have to regret is not that we declined the proposition, but the manner in which we declined it. I cannot conceal from myself that the tone which pervaded our answer went far to justify the very strong feeling of disappointment which prevailed in France. I, for one, never could perceive in the proposal for a Congress any just grounds for suspecting the motives of him who made it. He was placed in a very painful position by the result of the negotiations with Russia; it was natural for him to seek for some resource at a critical moment, and I should have thought that that was the very time when we should have taken the utmost pains to make a favourable impression upon the mind of our ally. All these circumstances when put together are quite sufficient to account for the general feeling of the country that we have incurred a certain amount of discredit. But when we hear from the echoes of another theatre of discussion that those mistakes are to carry with them the necessity of adopting a new code of foreign diplomacy, notwithstanding the very high authority by whom this proposition has been laid down, I must say I see no reason whatever for any such change. What I have always understood, and what I believe to be the constitutional view, is this—that questions of peace and war and foreign politics belong to the Crown of this country. The Ministers are the responsible advisers of the Sovereign. Parliament sits in judgment upon them when the conduct of any negotiations come before them. My noble Friend turns and appeals to the judgment of the other House; it is very natural that he should do so in his own vindication. But to say that the whole course of policy of our foreign affairs is to be altered is a proposition which I, for one, cannot accept. There is no question before us, and the subject has been so fully discussed already between my two noble Friends on opposite sides of the House, that I am unwilling to trespass further on the attention of your Lordships. At the same time, I cannot sit down without lamenting the course recently pursued by those great Powers who must exercise so vast an influence on the affairs of Europe. When we see Russia, notwithstanding the appeals made to her to reconsider her policy, adding cruelty to cruelty, not only in her treatment of her own subjects, but those over whom she had no right to tyrannise, and reducing her cruelty to a system that is calling down upon her the reprobation of all who are possessed with any feelings of humanity—when we consider how the hopes of those who thought that Austria was entering upon a course of constitutional Government have been disappointed—we can but feel the deepest regret that these great Powers should have entered upon a course so dangerous and so threatening to the peace of Europe. With regard to Prussia, no language can adequately express the degree of censure which is due to the Government of that country. The manner in which it has acted would justify the suspicion that there were political designs in the first instance in the course it pursued towards a weaker Power which has so many claims upon our interest. I am sorry to observe the manner in which blame has been thrown on the Danish Government, and the extreme severity with which some part of their conduct has been criticized. It is hardly fair to omit to mention the very difficult circumstances in which Denmark has been placed, and it is impossible not to admire the spirit and bravery shown by her people. Her resistance may seem to some to have been pushed to extremes; but we can hardly wonder that a country placed in a situation in which its dearest interests were attacked and its very existence called in question, should in defence of its liberties expose itself to a contest with Powers of overwhelming strength. Your Lordships must feel the deepest regret at the sad condition of an empire whose gallant struggles have everywhere called forth feelings of the strongest admiration; and we must, at the same time, regret that the circumstances of the country do not allow us to express our feelings of sympathy in another and more tangible manner.

POLICE (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM rose, pursuant to Notice—

“To call Attention to a Return pursuant to an Address of the House of Lords, dated the 31st of May, 1864, relative to the Proclamations of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland under the Provisions of the 11th Victoria, Chapter Two, for the Preservation of the Peace in the County of Donegal and Barony of Kilmacrenan: And a Copy of any Warrant issued by The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for the Search of Arms, within the Parish of Clondavadoo in the Barony of Kilmacrenan, within Twenty-one Days previous to the 21st Day of April, 1864: And to ask The Lord President if there is any Law to authorize the Police in Ireland to enter the Dwelling House of any of Her Majesty's Subjects without a Warrant, and to search it, or carry off any Property of any Kind whatsoever from such House without any such written Authority.”

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the police had received information that a certain person—a bailiff of the noble Earl—was in possession of arms without a licence. That information was not acted upon because the police had no regular warrant; but on a later occasion, when the police were on revenue duty, they found the gun and took it away in a legal manner.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he looked with some doubt and anxiety upon the working of a system under which the police were required to exercise the duties of revenue officers as well as their own proper duties. In this case the officer having entered under a warrant authorizing him to search for illicit spirits, found in the house a gun and seized it, upon the ground that the man had no licence to keep a gun.

[Bill 224.]

CONSIDERATION. THIRD READING.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. T. J. MILLER said, he had no intention of opposing the Bill, but he felt bound to protest against the principle involved in it, and he begged to express a hope that the measure would not be cited as a precedent for future legislation.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, that he only proposed to accomplish by the Bill the special object set forth in its clauses. He certainly had no intention of sanctioning by the measure the principle of the equalization of the rating for the relief of the poor throughout the metropolis.

Amendments made; to be now read 3°; read 3°, and passed.

BRADFORD RESERVOIRS.

QUESTION.

MR. FERRAND said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Messrs. Rawlinson and Beardmore, the Government Engineers, did not report to him that the bursting of the Sheffield Reservoir was caused by the fracture of the outlet pipes under the embankment; whether these outlet pipes have not been examined since their Report and found uninjured and undisturbed; and, if so, whether it is not necessary for the safety of the public that a Commission should be immediately appointed to inquire into the making of Reservoir Embankments?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, as the Report of Messrs. Rawlinson and Beardmore has been presented to the House, and has been printed and circulated, any hon. Member can refer to it for himself. But I do not find in it the statement ascribed to them in the question of the hon. Gentleman. They did not pretend to state precisely what was the cause of the accident. But they did say that, in their opinion, what they considered the objectionable mode of laying the outlet pipes most probably fractured not the pipes, but the puddle wall at the point of crossing. I do not know whether the pipes have been since examined, but if they have, and have been found uninjured, that would not be inconsistent with Messrs. Rawlinson and Beardmore's Report. I have already said that the possibility of laying down some general rule in future Waterworks Acts will be considered.

MR. FERRAND said, he wished to know whether the Government intend appointing a Commission?

SIR GEORGE GREY: I do not think that there will be any necessity for a formal Commission. Two or three engineers of experience might be consulted on the matter; but the Question is still under consideration.

MR. FERRAND said, he would also ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the lives of thousands of people are now endangered by the state of these Reservoirs, and that great anxiety naturally prevails to know whether anything will be done before Parliament separates?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Such a Commission as is suggested by the hon. Member for Bradford, and to which I suppose the hon. Gentleman refers, would not affect any works now existing, but only those to be constructed in future. If there really is the danger which is alleged, the hon. Gentleman, or those whom he represents, had better adopt the remedy which I pointed out the other night, and which will be found quite effectual.

SIERRA LEONE.

CASE OF MR. FITZJAMES.

QUESTION.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to put a Question to the Secretary of State for the Colonies which required a few words of explanation to make it intelligible, and in order that he might be regular he intended to conclude with a Motion. There was at Sierra Leone some time ago a gentleman of colour, named Fitzjames, a very respectable man, who had been called to the bar by the Middle Temple, had been first Law Officer of the Crown at Sierra Leone, and had acted for a time as Governor. The Governor of Sierra Leone, entertaining some hostility towards this gentleman, had used means to get rid of him, and the Colonial Office had lent themselves to that unworthy proceeding. In a Return, which he had moved for, and which had been presented to that House relating to the matter, statements were made by a Dr. Bradshaw aspersing the character of two respectable inhabitants of Sierra Leone. In order to try the merits of the case these two gentlemen had instituted proceedings against Dr. Bradshaw, and to prove the libel they wanted the original documents containing the libellous statements. The originals were in the hands of the Government of Sierra Leone, and the copies in the hands of the Colonial Office here. He wished, therefore, to ask, Whether the right hon. Gentleman would order that these papers, the contents of which had been circulated by the House, should be really at the command of the persons who wished to try by a jury whether they had been libelled or not? Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman might say that if the Court at Sierra Leone demanded these papers they would be given, but that without such a demand they would not. But he would impress on the right hon. Gentleman that a Judge at Sierra Leone was not in the independent position of a Judge at Westminster Hall, and would fear to do anything contrary to the wish of the Governor. He wished, therefore, to ask, whether the right hon. Gentleman will not send out peremptory orders that these documents shall be placed at the command of the party who brought the action? He would move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House do now adjourn."

MR. CARDWELL said, that this question was one not of politics but of law. A reference was made by the Governor of Sierra Leone to the person named by the hon. and learned Member; and that reference having been answered, the answer was laid last year, with other papers, on the table of the House. In the course of the year the solicitor of another party applied to him, as Colonial Secretary, for an order for the production of the paper in question. He had fortified himself with the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, which was to the effect that the communication was privileged, and would not be called for by any court of law. He intended, therefore, to leave the question to the decision of the court of law, with whose province it was not for him to interfere. The hon. and learned Gentleman said the court of law at Sierra Leone was not fit to decide the matter, but he did not believe that. If it was not fit to decide that question, it was not fit to be a Court of Justice for the decision of any question.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would withdraw his Motion.

THE DISTURBANCES IN NEW ZEALAND—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he has received a document entitled "Terms of Peace," bearing the signature of Mr. Fox, a Member of the Executive Council in New Zealand, and threatening extreme penalties on all Natives who shall not accede to the said terms; and whether he is aware that this Proclamation was issued and circulated in New Zealand without the cognizance of the Queen's Representative in that Colony?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, he had received no such Proclamation, nor had he received from the Governor of New Zealand any complaint that such a Proclamation had been published without his authority.

Sir George Gray

FLOGGING GAROTTERS.—QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to call the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to a paragraph which has appeared in some of the morning papers in reference to the flogging of two garotters in a prison in the county of Durham. The circumstances of the case he said were extremely brutalizing, and he wished to know if the Government will make some inquiry in reference to the subject?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he did not know what inquiry the hon. Gentleman wished him to make, for the infliction of this punishment was strictly in accordance with the Act passed last Session. By that Act the Judge specified the number of lashes to be inflicted, and the instrument which was to be used on the occasion, and doubtless there had been no departure from the law in this case. The punishment, of course, could not be otherwise than disagreeable.

PUBLIC RECORDS (IRELAND) COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. MONSELL said, he wished to ask, Whether the Commission relating to the Public Records of Ireland has been issued, and if so how soon it is likely to report?

MR. PEEL said, in reply, that it was proposed to have an inquiry into the charges made against Mr. Moran; and the Master of the Rolls in this country, at the request of the Government, had selected Mr. Duffus Hardy and Mr. Brewer to conduct the inquiry. These gentlemen were very competent persons for the task, and they were likely to commence their inquiry during the present week.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.
QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD HODGSON said, he wished to put a Question with regard to an alteration which had taken place in the arrangement of the business on the Order paper for this evening. Yesterday certain Resolutions relating to the revision of the Standing Orders on Private Business were fixed for further consideration at six o'clock to-night, and many hon. Members had come down to the House to take part in the discussion. It appeared, however, that at the morning sitting to-day, without notice to the hon. and gallant Member for North Lancashire, who had brought forward the subject, and without notice to the House, these Resolutions were postponed, at the instance of some hon. Member, till tomorrow at twelve o'clock, when many who took great interest in their discussion would be unable to attend. He wished to have some explanation of these facts, and to ask, Whether they could not now revert to the notice paper as delivered this morning, in order to proceed with the Resolutions?

MR. MALINS also complained of the course which had been adopted, and stated that he had come down to the House to consider this business, and then found that it had been postponed until the morrow, when he would not be able to attend.

SIR GEORGE GREY stated, that perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson Patten) would be able to answer the Question. He understood that when the adjournment of this private business was fixed for six o'clock that day, it was suggested that it would be better to fix it for twelve o'clock, because it could not otherwise come on till after the Motions were disposed of. He was under the impression that his hon. and gallant Friend had stated that he could not bring it on until twelve o'clock on Wednesday.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that the right hon. Baronet was in error in saying what he intended to do. He had suggested that it might be irregular to fix six o'clock for taking the adjourned debate, and stated that if that were so he should have no objection that it should go over till Wednesday. But he that morning found the Order set down for that day, and he had, in consequence, made arrangements to proceed with it that day. He, therefore, suffered as much inconvenience as other hon. Members on finding it postponed to Wednesday.

MR. SPEAKER said, the Order was set down for the six o'clock sitting, but it should be remembered that there was no power to vary the Standing Orders of the House. As an Order of the Day, it could only come on after all the Notices had been disposed of, which, he thought, would have created more inconvenience to hon. Members than the course which had been subsequently adopted. He understood the hon. and gallant Gentleman to say that he had foreseen the inconvenience himself, and to declare that it would be more suitable for his purpose that the matter should stand over as the first thing on Wednesday. Consequently at that morning's sitting a Motion was made which seemed in accordance with the views of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, that the adjourned debate should stand over till Wednesday, at twelve o'clock.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN expressed his regret that this business had been placed on the paper for six o'clock, and that hon. Members had been put to some inconvenience by its postponement.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY asked, with regard to what had occurred, and believing that there would not be a sufficient attendance on Wednesday, whether it would not be better to postpone the Order until Thursday, or until next Session? [Cries of "No, no!"]

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he had been pressed very urgently not to lose the chance of bringing on this business in the present Session, and therefore it would be taken on Wednesday as fixed.

CASE OF MR. O'MALLEY IRWIN.

ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. HENNESSY rose to call the attention of the House to one of the most extraordinary cases ever brought before Parliament, and he should conclude by moving that a certain petition of right might receive the fiat of the Queen. The case of Mr. O'Malley Irwin was one of gross and grievous injustice; and the statement which he (Mr. Hennessy) was about to make would, he believed, convince the House that this injustice had been suffered for the last thirty years through the culpable neglect of the Officers of the Crown. Mr. O'Malley Irwin, who in the year 1834 had been receiving seven guineas a day for performing judicial functions as deputy assistant barrister in Ireland, in the year 1835 was tried on a charge of forgery, was convicted, was imprisoned for nine months, and fined £50—all this being attributable to the fact that a certain important letter had been kept back at his trial by the Officers of the Crown. In 1840 the late Mr. O'Connell gave a professional opinion on the case, and stated, after carefully investigating all the documents, that Mr. Irwin was entitled to have his petition of right fitted owing to the loss of a letter of the 12th of October, 1834. That letter was written by Mr. Robert Johnston, who was the Assistant Barrister, Mr. O'Malley Irwin being his deputy. The letter which Mr. Irwin was charged with forging was dated the 3rd of October, 1834, and was signed by Johnston, and addressed to the right hon. G. Littleton, then Chief Secretary for Ireland, and was to the effect that he (Johnston) wished, in consequence of ill health, to resign his position as Assistant Barrister for the County of Mayo, and expressed a hope that he would receive a retiring pension. He would read to the House what was the opinion of the present Lord Chancellor of England upon the case, which had been referred to him by the right hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole), then Home Secretary. Sir Richard Bethell wrote in 1858 that, assuming the documents produced to him to be genuine, and the account of the manner in which they have been obtained to be true, he felt bound to say there was prima facie secondary evidence of the fact of Johnston having written the letter thanking the Government for having accepted his resignation, which Mr. Irwin is charged with having forged, and if that were so, he appeared to have suffered grievous injustice. Now, as to the lost link which the Lord Chancellor said was necessary to prove that Mr. Irwin had suffered grievous injustice. [Mr. ROEBUCK: He was not Lord Chancellor then.] It was true that he was then only Sir Richard Bethell. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield seemed to think that made all the difference, but he could not adopt that view, as he believed that, whether as Sir Richard Bethell or as Lord Westbury, the sense of justice was equally keen in that eminent personage. The letter of the 12th of October, 1834, had, after thirty years' concealment, been laid before Parliament. He had in his hand a Return that was moved for by the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk (Sir FitzRoy Kelly), for a copy of that document and also of a letter of October 7, 1834, from the Chief Secretary for Ireland, acknowledging the receipt of the letter of the 3rd of October, from Mr. Johnston, and he would first read to the House this letter from the Chief Secretary to Mr. Johnston—

"Sir—Your letter of the 3rd inst. was delivered to Mr. Craig by Mr. Irwin only yesterday evening. I am commanded by the Lord Lieutenant to express his regret that the state of your health is such as to render it necessary for you to resign the situation of assistant barrister for the county of Mayo. That part of your letter in which you express your hope that the number of years you have discharged the duties of that office will be considered by his Excellency as constituting a claim to the retiring pension of an as-assistant barrister will be made the subject of consideration by parties to whom the Lord Lieutenant has directed me to refer it, but his Excellency is desirous that you would have the goodness to detail more especially, either in a letter or in a memorial, the grounds of your claim, stating especially the date of your appointment."

Then came the missing letter, dated Clare, October 12, 1834, from Mr. Johnston to the Chief Secretary—

Sir,—I have had the honour of your favour of the 7th inst., having been addressed to Castlebar, only reached me the 12th. Your letter of the 8th, addressed to Thomas Gilda, Esq., the Clerk of the Peace, from his illness, not being able as yet to attend here, had received from him on the evening of the 10th. I had, consequently, sat two days in Crown business before any communication on the subject of my retirement. Your letter of the 8th, which I received, expressed Mr. King's appointment only to be temporary. Mr. Morris King arrived here on Friday, the 10th inst., and notified his appointment to me, which having forwarded, I have signified my retirement to him, and requested he would take up the civil business to-morrow. Your letter of the 7th, in a great measure insuring my retiring pension, is of the greatest satisfaction to me. I beg leave to express my most grateful thanks to his Excellency for the kind expressions concerning me on my retiring. I shall forward by to-morrow's post, not having time this day, the date of my appointment and my claim to the pension."

Now, if that letter was genuine, Mr. O'Malley Irwin had been, beyond all doubt, improperly convicted; and upon that point he was authorized by his hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. Longfield)—who regretted that he was not able to remain in the House—to state that he was present at the trial of Mr. O'Malley Irwin thirty years ago, and the impression left upon his mind was that that gentleman was innocent and had been improperly convicted, and that Johnston was the guilty man. Appended to the Return was the following note, which explained how it was that the letter of the 12th of October, 1834, had not been produced until now:—

"The foregoing copies of the letters of the 3rd and 12th of October, 1834, have been made from copies in the Chief Secretary's office, the originals not being in the office. The letter of the 12th of October was abstracted from the Crown Solicitor's papers during the trial of Mr. O'Malley Irwin, in 1835, for forgery of the letter of the 3rd of October, and has never been recovered."

Let the House understand that Mr. O'Malley Irwin was on his trial, the Crown Solicitor with his bundle of papers before him sat at the table, and yet the letter was abstracted. Who abstracted it? Not the man in the dock whose innocence it would have proved. He might surmise that in the vicinity of the Crown Solicitor was Mr.

Johnston, whose character was such that the hon. Member for Mallow declared the Bar of Ireland thought he was the guilty man. Fortunately, an official copy of the letter had been kept, which Colonel Larcom had at last succeeded in discovering. He (Mr. Hennessy) saw the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford in his place—who would, perhaps, be astonished to learn that, notwithstanding his conviction, Mr. O'Malley Irwin had never been disbarred. And how was that? Because it appeared to the Benchers of King's Inn that if that mysterious letter had been produced, Mr. Irwin would not have been convicted, and therefore they refused to disbar him. He had an old Dublin newspaper of 1841 in which was published a letter from Chief Justice Pennefather to Mr. O'Malley Irwin, in which he said that great injustice was done to Mr. O'Malley Irwin by the non-production of the document in question, which, if produced, would have entitled him to an acquittal. That letter was published and commented on ten years before the death of the Chief Justice. He had also a letter from Mr. Baron Greene, which proved that the leading Benchers of King's Inn were aware of the fact that evidence had been kept back at the trial. What then did Mr. O'Malley Irwin do? He had been unremitting in his efforts to obtain justice. When Mr. Irwin came out of prison he brought an action against the late Lord Normanby, then Lord Lieutenant, for keeping back the letters in question; and as it was understood that the papers had been sent to Lord John Russell, then Home Secretary, the noble Lord was subpoenaed to attend and produce them at the trial against the Lord Lieutenant. It was important to know what happened in relation to that summons. The person who served the summons in his affidavit said he had great difficulty in serving it, and at last left the copy in his Lordship's bosom at the House of Commons. That was in June, 1839. Lord John Russell, however, was guilty of contempt, and did not obey the summons. An attachment for that contempt was issued by Judge Coleridge, in reply to which Lord John Russell made an affidavit. He might mention that Lord John Russell communicated with Sir J. Campbell, at that time Attorney General, respecting that affidavit; and there was a letter from the latter, in which he said, "You can't prepare your affidavit until we see what the lunatic says," meaning this unfortunate gentleman. No doubt Sir J.

Campbell might have considered Mr. Irwin a lunatic, for he was constantly endeavouring to obtain the discovery of the letter which would have vindicated his innocence, a copy of which had at length been brought to light. Lord John Russell then made an affidavit. The writ recited three documents by date, and twice recited the letter of October 12, 1834, giving a precise description of the document. Lord John Russell in his affidavit swore that he attended in pursuance of the said writ at the court at Westminster; that he was detained on his way to the court by several persons who spoke to him about public business; that he did not reach the court until the case of the plaintiff was closed, and the Attorney General was addressing the Court on behalf of the defendant; that he was asked whether he had brought with him the documents required by the sub poena duces tecum, to which he replied that he had not brought them, though he admitted that the said papers were in his custody as Secretary of State. So much for Lord John Russell as a witness. But Lord John Russell as a correspondent was equally interesting in this case. He (Mr. Hennessy) had seen some twenty letters written by Mr. O'Malley Irwin to Lord John Russell, begging and imploring his Lordship to search for the letter of October, 1834, and asking that such letter, or a copy of it, should be sent to him. These letters, which had recently been tumbled out of the Home Office, were all marked nil—Lord John Russell would never condescend to give any reply to them. Mr. Irwin, having failed in his action against Lord Normanby, had from that day to this brought actions against almost every Minister of the Crown. He had been most unremitting, because he was conscious of his own innocence, and felt that the day would come when this important document would be raked up. So he persisted in bringing actions and in calling the attention of Parliament to the case. In 1838, Mr. O'Connell asked for a Select Committee to recover the letter, and the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel French) presented a petition with a similar prayer. Among other documents which had turned up at the Home Office there was a note marked "R.B.," in which the present Lord Chancellor, remarking on Mr. Irwin's case, said in effect—"It depends on the proof of Johnston's letter. That letter cannot be found, but if it can be produced, Mr. Irwin has suffered grievous injustice." He (Mr.

Hennessy) believed that no doubt would be expressed to-night as to the authenticity of this letter. He had felt some surprise the other night at the ambiguous reference made by the hon. and learned Gentleman to the document. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL: At that time I knew nothing about it.] He understood that information since then had reached the Government as to this letter, and that its authenticity would not be denied. His statement would thus be rendered much shorter than it must otherwise have been. The Motion he was about to submit was for an Address praying Her Majesty to grant her fiat to the petition of right of Mr. Irwin. This petition had been drawn up by an hon. and learned Member of this House, and it was approved by an hon. and learned Gentleman who had held the office of Attorney General in this country, and by one of the most eminent common law pleaders at the English Bar. He understood that the Motion was to be opposed by the Government, but in doing so they would be taking a very serious step. The Home Secretary and the Attorney General were said to be of opinion that they had the power to refuse the fiat. But who were they who refused the fiat? They were the real defendants in this case. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and above all the Attorney General, would be practically on their trial if the fiat were given, and this case were allowed to go before a jury. They were the defendants, and yet they constituted themselves judges, and assumed the power to refuse the petition of right. Now upon the constitutional question he would read a few lines from a speech delivered in this House by the hon. and learned Member (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) in July, 1863—

"After the passing of the Act of Parliament, for which the country was indebted to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Bovill), Mr. O'Malley Irwin caused to be prepared for presentation to Her Majesty a Petition of Right; but the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department felt it to be his duty to advise the Crown to withhold its fiat to that Petition of Right, and Mr. O'Malley Irwin was again baffled in his endeavours to procure justice. Now he (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) was prepared to maintain, as a proposition founded upon the constitution and the law of this country, that it was not competent or consistent with the duty of any officer of the Crown to advise the Queen to withhold her fiat to any Petition of Right upon any ground, whether right or wrong, whether well or ill founded. Such an interference was only to be justified in a case where a petition appeared to be founded on fraud, or upon gross and manifest error." [3 Hansard, clxxii. 1174.]

Mr. Chitty, in his work on the Prerogative, said that a petition of right was the birth-right of the subject, and it was maintainable at common law. Mr. Manning, a high authority, said in his Exchequer Practice, "As the prayer of the petition is grantable ex debito justitiæ, it is called a petition of right." These authorities fortified him in the opinion that the Government had no right to refuse the fiat of the Queen to this petition. Let the case come before a jury. For thirty years Mr. Irwin had been trying to obtain justice, but had been baffled for the want of a certain document, of which at last he had got an authentic copy, and that copy, with the note appended that it was abstracted from the Crown official papers, afforded, in the opinion of the hon. and learned Member, a sufficient ground for the petition of right. It would probably be urged in answer to his Motion, that the Act of Parliament said that the Queen must be "graciously pleased" to issue the fiat, but those very words were used in connection with writs issued by other Courts. Lord Cottenham had said in 1846, in reference to a case on this point, which had not the same claims as the one now before the House, but which was evidently frivolous and vexatious, "What a bar it would be to justice, if parties having a claim against the Crown could not proceed without the permission of the Law Officers of the Crown!" And Lord Brougham had expressed a similar opinion. In dealing with this matter he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would remember the position he occupied. If the Government, after the merits of the case had been fully set forth, adopted the unprecedented course of refusing a fiat, he did not know what other course would remain to Members of the House who, like himself, were firmly convinced of the innocence of Mr. Irwin and the guilt of the Crown Officers, than to bring forward a more serious Motion. Of one thing, however, the Government might be sure—that they could not succeed in keeping from the public a case which, according to the Lord Chancellor, exhibited such grievous injustice, by withholding it from a jury. The hon. and learned Member concluded by moving

"That a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to grant Her Fiat to the Petition of Right of George O'Malley Irwin, esquire, or to satisfy his claims without suit."

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) said, that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Queen's County had very properly addressed his observations to his right hon. Friend the Attorney General, whose special duty it was to deal with this Question; but he conceived that it would be a convenient course, and perhaps more fair to the House, if he stated some facts which he had ascertained within the last two hours in reference to this case. His attention had only lately been drawn to the case, and he at once felt it to be his duty to take means to ascertain as far as he could the real facts by reference to Ireland. He had received, in consequence, a multitude of genuine and contemporaneous documents, which he had endeavoured to master as well as he could during the last two hours, and he believed that he would be able to give an explanation of the case to the House which it did not receive when it was last presented to their notice. What had struck him most particularly when his attention was first drawn to the matter was the fact that, if there were anything in Mr. O'Malley Irwin's case at all, it necessarily involved imputations of the grossest and most terrible kind against distinguished persons both living and dead. The case was this. In 1835 Mr. O'Malley Irwin was tried for an offence which he believed at that time rendered a person on conviction liable to transportation—at all events, to very serious consequences. The Attorney General of that day, now Lord Justice of Appeals—Mr. Blackburne—acted as prosecutor, and he was assisted by the Solicitor General, Sir Michael O'Loughlen, afterwards Master of the Rolls, and by Mr. Serjeant Greene, afterwards Baron Greene, than whom three men more distinguished for ability and integrity it would be difficult to find. On the second trial he was prosecuted for the same offence by Sir Michael O'Loughlen, then Attorney General, and the Solicitor General, Mr. Woulfe. The imputation to which he had alluded was that a document known by the Crown Officers to be in existence had been deliberately kept back from the jury under the direction of those distinguished persons, and that they, together with the Crown Solicitor for Ireland, Mr. Kemmis, were concerned in a conspiracy against Mr. O'Malley Irwin, the object of which was to get him unjustly convicted, and that they obtained that result by the suppression of this document. At the time when he first heard that statement, it struck him that the charge was of a nature not only grave, but most incredible, although for the moment he was unable to explain the facts. He now asked the attention of the House for a short time while he gave the real explanation of the affair. It was now thirty years old, and a great many of the personages concerned had died, but living evidence could still be produced to verify his statements. Among the documents sent to him, he held letters under the hand of Mr. O'Malley Irwin himself. The statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Queen's County was, that a letter was suppressed and concealed for thirty years; that though the existence of the letter was not unknown to Mr. O'Malley Irwin, he was not acquainted with its terms; and that successive Governments in England and Ireland had refused to do him justice. Mr. Kemmis who, he was sorry to say, had died within the last ten days, had stated that for nine years he was not aware that Mr. Irwin had any imputation against him, and that on coming to London to attend in the great O'Connell case before the House of Lords he was astonished to find himself arrested in the street at the instance of Mr. Irwin, on the charge of stealing this document from the Castle of Dublin. As would be expected, the case was at once dismissed; and on returning to Ireland Mr. Kemmis made a statement to the Government of the facts of the case, which he should now very briefly communicate to the House. When the case first came on for trial in February, 1835, the charge against Mr. Irwin was that he had, for the purpose of obtaining the chairmanship of a county in Ireland, presented, without the authority of Mr. Johnston, the chairman of the county, a document purporting to be the resignation of that gentleman. There appeared to have been some attempt at a corrupt arrangement between Mr. Irwin and some of the friends of Mr. Johnston, the object being to induce the latter gentleman to resign his office, and the bargain contemplated seemed to be that Mr. Johnston, in addition to the Government pension, should receive £2,000 from Mr. Irwin. On the case coming on for trial, Mr. Blackburne, the Attorney General, in stating the facts to the jury, read the very letter which was now before the House, and which formed the subject of the hon. Gentleman's charge. [Mr. HENNESSY: Was this at the first trial?] Yes, it was; and Mr. Blackburne also read to the jury the letter of the then Chief Secretary to Mr. Johnston, Mr. Johnston's reply, and some other correspondence. In the course of the case, however, the document of the 12th of October was abstracted from the court, and although read by counsel was not put in evidence by the Crown. The trial went on, and Mr. O'Malley Irwin was convicted. The case must have been removed by certiorari, and thereby acquired the incidents of a civil suit. Application was then made for a new trial, and one of the grounds put forward was that the original of the document of the 12th of October had not been given in evidence. Some months after the new trial came on, when Sir Michael O'Loghlen, the Attorney General, stated in terms the letter to the second jury, everything having been done to establish it as secondary evidence. Notice was given to Mr. Irwin himself to produce the letter, if the original came into his hands, and a copy of it was sent to him, with a notice that it would be used at this the second trial. Accordingly, the copy was admitted as secondary evidence of the original; it was commented on by Mr. Irwin himself, and further by the Judge, who gave full effect to it in its bearing on the crime with which Mr. Irwin was charged. That having been done, the second jury, like the first, convicted Mr. Irwin; and were they now to be told that this letter, which had been read on two trials, by two Attorney Generals, a copy of which had been furnished to Mr. Irwin, and on which he had commented at the second trial, had been concealed for thirty years, and had never been seen by Mr. Irwin till it was placed on the table of the House? [Mr. HENNESSY said, he did not state that.] The House must remember that this was not at all a new case, and that it had been thoroughly investigated when all those were alive who could give evidence on it, and who had conducted the case. Mr. Irwin was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment and a fine of £50. A month or two after the term of imprisonment to which he was sentenced had expired, Mr. Irwin applied to the Law Officers of the Crown to obtain the remission of the fine, on the ground that he was unable to pay it. That letter was dated the 20th September, 1836, and contained some important admissions. The writer said—

"Without impugning in the remotest degree the verdict of a jury or the decision of the Court of King's Bench, which sanctioned that verdict, I beg leave most respectfully to submit, in order to justify your compliance, that the prosecution against me was not founded upon a statutable indictment, but at common law; and I venture to impress on you there is no guilt if the mind be not disposed: Non est reus si mens non est rea; and that it is not by isolated passages, but by the context of what goes before, and follows after, a correct judgment can be formed. In refutation of an intention of fraud or to deceive, what stronger evidence can be adduced than that my letter of the 15th of September, 1833, addressed to the Private Secretary of the then Lord Lieutenant, was sent by me before the resignation, expressly referring to the then Solicitor General (Mr. Justice Crompton), and stating 'that the resignation of an assistant-barrister (alluding to Mr. Johnston) had been placed in my hands;' and that after the resignation, Mr. Johnston, the assistant-barrister, by letter, expressed 'his greatest satisfaction' and returned 'his' most grateful thanks to his then Excellency for his kind expressions concerning him on 'his' retiring; in reply to the Chief Secretary's letter, officially acknowledging the receipt of his resignation, and expressing his Excellency's regret on the occasion of his retiring, and that 'I' personally delivered it (the resignation). Conscious of the rectitude of my motives and of the soundness of the immortal spirit of Alfred's policy (if to him we owe the common law), I await your judgment with confidence; and, completely borne down by the grievous consequences of the adverse verdict and the great weight opposed to me, I trust you will consider the punishment already inflicted, and not sanction le droit du plus fort.

"I am, gentlemen, your most obedient and humble servant,

"GEO. O'MALLEY IRWIN.

"To the Law Advisers of the Crown, Chief Secretary's Department, Dublin Castle."

That letter clearly proved two things—that the case of Mr. Irwin as to the missing letter was a mere afterthought, and that on the 20th of September, 1836, at all events, he had a copy of the letter in his possession, for he quoted expressions from it between inverted commas. Mr. Irwin did not venture to say to the Law Officers who prosecuted him that they had suppressed evidence. Sir Michael O'Loughlen, in his indorsement of this letter from Newgate, said that it was usual in such a case when a prisoner was unable to pay the fine to remit it, and added—

"In the present case the prisoner has been detained nearly two months in default of payment of the fine, and though I would not have considered a more lengthened imprisonment than that to which he was sentenced too severe punishment for his offence, I would recommend that he be discharged if he is not able to pay the fine."

That was dated October 14, 1836; and the recommendation was acted upon. In an affidavit on June 5, 1835, Mr. Johnston declared that he wrote the letter of the 12th of October "under very great embarrassment and enervation of mind," in consequence of his being under the impression that he was to be superseded by the issue of a new appointment; and Sir M. O'Loughlen indorsed that affidavit to the effect that in his opinion there was no ground for interfering in the case, and that the sentence should not be mitigated. In 1841 an application for a petition of right was made by Mr. Irwin; but Chief Baron Pigot expressed his opinion that such a proceeding was wholly inapplicable to such a case, and that Her Majesty could not with propriety be advised to fiat the petition. The Chief Baron, than whom there was no more astute or conscientious man, in the investigation of evidence, said, that the copy of the letter of the 12th of October, 1834, was read in evidence at both trials; that that copy, with respect to the authenticity of which there was no dispute, was placed in the hands of Mr. Johnston, who was examined in reference to it by Mr. Irwin; that the letter was commented on by Mr. Irwin in his address to the jury, before whom the testimony was fully laid, with Mr. Johnston's explanation; and that one of the questions left to the jury was whether they believed Johnston had given Irwin authority to convey to the Government his resignation of the office of assistant barrister. Now, it should be remembered that all that happened only six years after the trial of Mr. Irwin had taken place; but there was also a statement of the present Master of the Rolls in Ireland, who was not a person likely to allow anything which came before him to escape unnoticed, to the effect that in his opinion Mr. Irwin's charge against Mr. Kemmis was devoid of foundation. Such was the view taken by the Master of the Rolls when he was Attorney General in 1844, and it was idle after so great a lapse of time for his hon. and learned Friend to contend that a petition of right was to be fiat by the Crown because what he seemed to regard as all-important documents had been suppressed. So far as he was concerned in the matter, he would not trouble the House further, save so far as to make a few remarks with reference to what had been said about very distinguished persons having given a sort of approval to Mr. Irwin's case. Now Mr. O'Connell, than whom there was no more eminent man in his profession, got Mr. Irwin's statement of the case from himself, and, as his retaining counsel, no doubt gave an opinion in his favour. Mr. O'Connell, however, was unaware of the facts which had just been laid before the House; he had not the truth disclosed to him, and, that being so, his opinion could not be regarded as worth a farthing, while the opinion of the present Lord Chancellor was wholly based on the assumption that Mr. Irwin's statement was to be relied on, and that there was no opposing testimony. He himself, proceeding on that assumption, was equally ready to admit that Mr. Irwin had suffered a great wrong; but it was not fair to construe an opinion accompanied by such qualifications as an absolute expression of opinion. He could only say that he entirely concurred with Chief Baron Pigot in thinking the case was not one for a petition of right, and he maintained that the Government would disregard their duty to society if they were to grant one after a full consideration of the facts which had been disclosed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that after the exhaustive statement of his right hon. and learned Friend he should not have risen but that the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had raised an important legal and constitutional question. It so happened that the last of these so-called petitions of right was presented by Mr. O'Malley Irwin in the time of his immediate predecessor, who added another to the numerous Attorney Generals who had all felt it to be absolutely inconsistent with their duty to endorse the fiat on a petition of right of that description. He could assure the House that the position taken by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite went to subvert the most fundamental principles of our law. Let him take the dates and facts from Mr. Irwin's own statement. Mr. Irwin himself said that in July, 1844, he transmitted through Sir William Follett, then Attorney General, his petition of right to the Secretary of State. He was informed there had been an earlier petition of right which Sir Frederick Pollock did not think fit to direct to be fiat. But Sir William Follett was of opinion that it was no petition of right at all, and accordingly nothing was done upon it. In 1852, when Mr. Walpole was Secretary of State, and Sir Frederick Thesiger and Sir Fitzroy Kelly were the Attorney and the Solicitor Generals, Mr. Irwin again renewed his attempt. It was a mere matter of course that when that which called itself a petition of right came to the Home Office it should be laid before the Attorney General to ascertain whether he would advise the usual endorsements to be put upon it, and the fact that that was not done showed that Sir Frederick Thesiger like all other Attorney Generals, was of opinion that this was no petition of right at all, and not a document which could properly be endorsed. Nevertheless, the right hon. Gentleman then the Home Secretary, whose kindness of heart they all knew, was desirous to have the matter inquired into in some way, in order that it might be seen whether there was any case upon which anything could be done for this unfortunate gentleman. Mr. Walpole accordingly referred the document to Sir Richard Bethell, then a private barrister—the last thing which the Home Secretary would have done if he had thought it a petition of right. Nothing came from that reference, nor was anything done in regard to the matter when Sir Richard Bethell himself for the first time succeeded to office. In 1858, when Lord Derby again came into power, the hypothetical and most guarded opinion was given by Sir Richard Bethell, that if all Mr. Irwin's allegations were right, and there was no case to the contrary, then he had suffered grievous injustice. But then occurred another change of Government, and another petition of right was presented by Mr. Irwin on the 24th of April, 1861, when Sir Richard Bethell was Attorney General, and he of course was the Law Officer to whom that petition must have been submitted to determine whether it could be endorsed as a petition of right. He advised, like all his predecessors, that it could not be so treated; and Mr. Irwin in a letter spoke of that Law Officer in no complimentary terms in consequence. A fundamental fallacy had pervaded the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. Misled by the words "petition of right," he seemed to think that any document to which any man chose to give that name was a petition of right within the meaning of the law, than which there could be no greater mistake. Both before the recent Act, and since the passing of that Act, the petition of right was the remedy which applied where the property of a subject was alleged to be in the hands of the Crown, or where money was claimed under contract by a subject from the Crown, and where there was an absence of an appropriate compulsory remedy against the Crown. Where there was a want of such a compulsory remedy against the Crown, then, and then only, a petition of right would lie to recover property or money due under contract. In the present case they had merely the allegation that Mr. O'Malley Irwin had been twice convicted by a jury of an offence against the laws of the country; that that conviction remained unreversed, and that he was entitled to compensation. It was ridiculous to argue, therefore, that he was in the position of a person who could not use the ordinary compulsory process of law against the Sovereign. It was a fundamental maxim of our law that the Crown could do no wrong; and that principle, rightly understood, was almost the corner stone of our liberties. It meant that they could not impute to the Crown any wrong that was done; and for that reason not even the personal command of the Sovereign could exonerate any person by whom a wrong was done from personal liability for the wrong; and if it were true that in the course of all these proceedings there had been any dereliction of duty on the part of the vast number of public officers who had been more or less connected with them—if the Crown prosecutor had, for example, withheld evidence when he ought to have produced it—they were personally liable under the law and constitution for such acts. To say, then, that the Crown was to be responsible for all the wrong done by its servants was to contradict principles of law so fundamental that he was really astonished that a Gentleman with the hon. and learned Member's knowledge should rise in that House and gravely attempt such a thing. What were the rules laid down by the highest authorities on these matters. Here were the words of Blackstone—

"Petition of right is of use where the King is in full possession of any hereditaments or chattels, and the petitioner suggests such a right as controverts the title of the Crown, grounded on facts disclosed in the petition itself."

As to the impossibility of the King doing no wrong, Blackstone said—

"The King can do no wrong, which ancient and fundamental maxim is not to be understood as if every transaction by the Government was of course just and lawful, but means only two things—first, whatever is exceptionable in the conduct of public affairs is not to be imputed to the King, nor is he answerable for it personally to his people; for this doctrine would destroy the constitutional independence of the Crown; and, secondly, that the prerogative of the Crown extends not to do any injury."

To this, Lord Chief Justice Erle, in a case in the Common Pleas, had added the following remark:—

"This maxim has been constantly recognized, and the notion of making the King responsible in damages for a supposed wrong tends to consequences that are clearly inconsistent with the duty of the Sovereign."

Lord Lyndhurst had investigated the subject in 1843, when Lord Canterbury brought a petition of right to recover the value of certain property destroyed at the fire in the Houses of Parliament. That was a very flimsy case; but there was an element of property as well as a supposed contract by the Crown to do all that was necessary to preserve the property from fire. Lord Lyndhurst, in that case, said—

"Is it supposed that the Crown is responsible for the conduct of all persons holding public offices and appointments, and bound to make good any loss or injury which may be occasioned by their negligence or delinquency? At least some authority should be cited in support of such a doctrine. . . . Stamford says:—Petition is all the remedy the subject hath when the King seizeth his land or taketh away his goods from him, having no title by order of his laws to do so, in which case the subject, for his remedy, is driven to sue unto his Sovereign lord by way of petition only, for other remedy hath he not. He speaks of this proceeding as applicable to the illegal seizure by the King of the lands or goods of a subject; and, although, this is not conclusive against its application to other cases, yet no instance has been cited, &c. . . . The Year Books, with the abridgments of Fitzherbert and Brooke, and other authorities, have been carefully searched, and no case has been found to warrant this proceeding. The decisions go back several hundred years, and in the absence of all precedent during so long a period, I think I should not be justified in deciding, for the first time, that such a proceeding can be maintained. Indeed, if the Crown cannot be guilty of negligence or personal misconduct, and is not responsible for the negligence or personal misconduct of its servants, it follows, of course, that in those cases there can be no such remedy; and, on the other hand, the absence of all trace of the remedy would itself afford a strong argument against the liability."

Still more recently in the Court of Common Pleas it had become necessary to investigate the same principles in a case in which the Law Officers thought it their duty to grant a petition of right, as a question of property was involved. A vessel had been seized by our African squadron on suspicion of being engaged in the slave trade, and there was a sort of question whether the Crown might not be supposed to be wrongly in possession of the property thus seized. In that case Lord Chief Justice Erle said—

"To these reasons and authorities we would add an opinion, that there is good ground for maintaining that which we find to be the law on this subject. We think that if each of the Queen's subjects who believed he had been at any time in any reign wronged in the administration of civil or military affairs could sue the Sovereign for the time being for the amount at which he might estimate his damage, the extent of pernicious result would be great."

The House probably was aware that Mr. Irwin had passed his life since the time of this trial in bringing actions against everybody—Lord Normanby, Lord John Russell, Sir George Grey; and only last Saturday his right hon. Friend (Sir George Grey) was charged by him before a magistrate in London with no less a crime than high treason. The magistrate, however, was so sensible as not to entertain the charge, for which failure of justice, no doubt, in due course of time, Mr. Irwin would apply for another petition of right. Lord Chief Justice Erle went on in this very judgment to refer to the action against Sir George Grey as an instance of the absurdity of sanctioning a petition of right in every case where it was applied for. He said—

"And we refer to the petition of right adduced in evidence in Irwin v. Sir George Grey' (3 Fost. & Fin. 685) as an example of the mischief which might arise if such was the law."

Since he had the honour of holding his present office he had been asked to endorse a petition of right for a man who had an action pending at the time, when it pleased Parliament to pass a general Act which might be pleaded in bar to his action. According to the doctrines which had been stated on this subject, if an Election Committee unseated a Member he might have a petition of right for wrongful deprivation of his seat. Nothing could better illustrate the extravagant notions which seemed to be held as to these petitions than a document which had lately been forwarded to him. It was a petition to Her Majesty from a Mr. Clare, who had had an action against the Admiralty by a petition of right on some patents and had lost the verdict, at which, of course, he was very much discontented. Mr. Clare had made some most extraordinary statements and accusations in this document. For instance, he said—

"If ever a trial at law were won by the plaintiff, and proved by the defendant for the plaintiff, the case of 'Clare v. the Queen' is the one, from the fact that all the Admiralty witnesses were broken down on cross-examination. If ever a trial were garbled by the press for the defendant, to the prejudice of the plaintiff, the case of 'Clare v. the Queen' is the one. If ever a Judge sat on the bench biased, the Lord Chief Justice's speech for the Admiralty in the case of 'Clare v. the Queen' is a ratification in toto. If ever a verdict was given against the weight of evidence, it was in the trial of 'Clare v. the Queen.' If ever subornation of perjury were divulged, it was on the trial of 'Clare v. the Queen.' If every conspiracy were made use of to swindle a

"1. To see that I am settled with in full, with interest, for my patents and inventions, both for the past and for the future, and that all my claims for losses that have accrued to me by the Admiralty withholding from me the payment of my just rights, along with all the expenses I have been put to in developing and promoting this great modern question of metal shipbuilding, and the legal charges contingent on this case to be paid me. 2. That my knowledge shall be set free throughout the Royal Dockyards, and that I am remunerated in accordance with my capabilities upon a percentage on outlay. 3. That the appointment of Naval Mechanical Constructor to the British nation, with hereditary title, in unison with the paramount importance of my patents and inventions to Great Britain, be granted to me, per patent. 4. That hereditary titles be presented to those gentlemen who have so nobly stood by me on public grounds during my oppression from the Admiralty, to their eternal fame—namely, Mr. W. Titherington, of Dee Hills, Chester, and Mr. Edwin Haigh, of Cote Brook, Tarporley. 5. That your Majesty disqualify Sir Alexander James Edmund Cockburn, the Lord Chief Justice of England. 6. Ex-office Mr. Collier as Solicitor General, and withdraw his patent as Q.C. 7. Withdraw the patent of Q.C. from Sir William Atherton. 8. Cause the Lord Chancellor to disbar Sir W. Atherton, Mr. Collier, Mr. West, and Mr. Maclory."

It was absurd to say that the Attorney General was not to exercise his common sense as to endorsing these petitions of right. He (the Attorney General) had acted as his predecessors had done, and refused to advise the Crown to act on the document in question. The Court of Chancery protected itself against frivolous proceedings by requiring the signature of counsel to petitions, and the House of Lords required the certificate of counsel that appeals were proper and reasonable. It was also the duty of the Law Officers to exercise a judgment as to whether what was called a petition of right was not an abuse of the name; and if the present Law Officers had put their fiat on this gentleman's petition, they would have adopted a different course from that which had been pursued by their predecessors during a period of thirty years, and would have given advice the tendency of which must have been most pernicious.

MR. MALINS said, that the case of Mr. O'Malley Irwin, as brought forward by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the King's County, if not contradicted, would have required some consideration; but when it appeared from the statement of the Attorney General for Ireland, that the letter of the 12th October, 1834, was used both at the first and second trial, the case of Mr. O'Malley Irwin became perfectly ridiculous. Mr. O'Malley Irwin had pursued him for several years. Wherever he went, up started Mr. O'Malley Irwin (invariably armed with the opinion of Sir Richard Bethell and other authorities) in a manner that was magical, and poured forth his grievances. He had taken some pains to investigate the case, and had come to the conclusion that it was unfounded; and, as Mr. O'Malley Irwin had vexed every lawyer and every tribunal for twenty-eight years, he became afraid that that gentleman might bring an action against him for not having paid sufficient attention to his papers and statements. He held that the privilege which the Law Advisers of the Crown had of refusing their fiat to a petition of right ought to be exercised with great caution, but he believed that they were right in refusing it in the present instance. Mr. O'Malley Irwin had been tried by the laws of his country, and, in addition, had had the unusual advantage of a second trial; and although he was convicted on each occasion, he had been pestering all the Courts of the country for redress ever since, while a person who had been convicted at the Old Bailey thirty years ago would have as good a right to claim it as Mr. O'Malley Irwin had. The case had been thoroughly investigated, and he hoped Parliament would hear no more of it.

Mr. HADFIELD said, that to demands at law there was a statutable limitation of six years. He thought there ought to be some such limitation in respect to demands on Parliament. If they heard claims of thirty years' standing, why not hear those of 300? He was surprised that, after the lapse of thirty years, so satisfactory an answer could have been given to the present case.

Mr. HENNESSY, in reply, said he wished to say a few words, both on the question of fact and the question of law. He again quoted to the House the opinion of the late Mr. O'Connell, who had been employed by Mr. Irwin as counsel in the case, to the effect that he was entitled to proceed by petition of right. Mr. Kemmis's statement of the case was totally false. That document was prepared for Lord John Russell, and was minuted by him, but it contained a grave misstatement of fact. [The hon. and learned Gentleman here quoted some documents which bore the endorsement of Lord John Russell when at the Home Office.] Mr. Kemmis, in his account of the transaction, did not give the letter of the 12th of October, 1834, but only his own version of the case; and that statement had deceived Lord John Russell. Mr. Irwin had obtained copies of the letters from Mr. Vignolles, and Mr. Armstrong, a Protestant clergyman; but the Crown had not acknowledged their authenticity. Supported by the opinion of Mr. O'Connell, who gave it after much deliberation, and by the opinion of Chief Justice Pennefather, he was inclined to think that his right hon. and learned Friend had been misled by the documents which had so recently been placed in his hands. He hoped the Government would lay those documents on the table, for they should not refer to official documents unless they were laid on the table. He adhered to the opinion of Mr. O'Connell that Mr. O'Malley Irwin had suffered a grievous injustice, and that this petition of right should be fiatd by the Crown.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he wished to say one or two words with reference to the use which had been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman of the documents from which he had just quoted. From what had been stated by the hon. and learned Gentleman they appeared to be official documents, some of them confidential communications between the Private Secretary of Lord John Russell and the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. One of these documents bore the endorsement of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and they must have been abstracted from the office of the Secretary of State. He did not ask the hon. and learned Gentleman how he obtained possession of them, for no doubt they came to him through Mr. O'Malley Irwin. How Mr. O'Malley Irwin could come by them he did not understand; but he hoped the example set by the hon. and learned Gentleman of quoting from such private and confidential documents in that House would not be drawn into a precedent.

Mr. HENNESSY read a letter signed "S. H. Walpole," which enclosed the documents when that right hon. Gentleman was Secretary of State for the Home Department, addressed to Mr. O'Malley Irwin.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that he was quite sure his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge could not have placed documents of that kind at the disposal of any individual, except by mistake or accident.

BILL—(No. 253).

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD WODEHOUSE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that the object of the measure was to alleviate as much as possible the distress which existed in some districts of the metropolis. Their Lordships were aware of the distressing cases which had of late frequently appeared in the public journals, arising from the want of sufficient means to relieve the casual poor. Cases had occurred of persons being left without food or shelter during the inclement nights of winter, and in some instances the death of the unfortunate persons so exposed had been the result. It was the fact that in the several unions of London there were in the aggregate 500 destitute persons applying for casual relief daily; but from the want of the necessary accommodation, many cases of great hardship—almost of cruelty—were of constant occurrence. It was not too strong an expression to say that such a state of things was a disgrace to the capital of a civilized country like this. A Committee appointed to inquire into the subject had presented a Report to Parliament, recommending that the charge for the casual poor should be paid out of a rate levied on the rateable property of the whole metropolis, and that the Metropolitan Board of Works should be the machinery for collecting such rate, while the Poor Law Board prescribed the necessary arrangements. It was calculated that the required funds might be raised by a rate not exceeding one-sixth of a penny in the pound. Some complaint had been made that the Bill had been introduced so late in the Session; but it should be borne in mind that the Report of the Committee was only presented on the last day of May. On the 16th of June the President of the Poor Law Board sent out circulars to the Metropolitan Boards of Guardians, calling attention to the Report; and a great number of the Boards approved the scheme embodied in the present Bill, the operation of which was limited to a period ending on Lady Day next. It would be for Parliament next Session to adopt some well considered and permanent measure for effecting the object. In reference to the relief of casual poor it was reasonable to regard the whole metropolis as one district, and it was desirable to take precautions against the recurrence of such scenes of misery and distress as were witnessed last winter.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2*."
—(Lord Wodehouse.)

THE EARL OF POWIS said, that as the Bill was merely a temporary measure, he would not now argue whether the plan proposed was or was not the proper way for providing for the casual poor; but he could not see the slightest necessity for the Metropolitan Board of Works being employed merely for the purpose of discharging the functions of bankers. That was a duty which the Bank of England might more properly perform.

EARL FORTESCUE regarded the Bill as one of great importance, and the proposition to spread the charge over the whole metropolis appeared consistent with a sense of fairness; but he could not agree that the machinery by which the rate was proposed to be collected was the best. He feared, too, that as before there had been a tendency on the part of some Boards of Guardians unduly to restrict relief to the casual poor, there would now be, when the cost was to be defrayed out of a common fund, a rivalry in expenditure with the view of obtaining popular favour. He thought the Bill should have been introduced at an earlier period of the Session, and that the opinions of the Boards of Guardians should have been earlier obtained.

LORD REDESDALE had the same objection to this Bill which he had expressed with regard to the Poor Removal Bill—namely, that it had been brought up to their Lordships' House at too late a period of the Session to admit of any Amendments being proposed or the Bill being properly considered. It was a very serious subject of complaint, and had now become a systematic practice of the Poor Law Board, that important measures should be introduced at such an advanced period of the Session, that it was quite impossible to give them that consideration which their importance demanded. It was nonsense to talk of obtaining the opinions of the Poor Law Guardians before introducing the Bill. The proper course would have been for the Department to have framed a Bill and then submitted its provisions for the consideration of the Poor Law Guardians. The machinery of this Bill was defective in various particulars, and its effect would be to increase the number of vagrants, to draw the most abandoned from that part of the metropolis where they were known to those parts where they were not known, since no means were provided for testing in any way the character of the applicants for relief. The provision by which the money was to be raised by means of the Metropolitan Board of Works was also highly objectionable. Other provisions of the Bill were highly objectionable, but there was no time to propose any Amendments. For his own justification, therefore, and to enable other noble Lords to show their sense of the impropriety of introducing so important a Bill at the very end of the Session, he should move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Three Months.")—(Lord Redesdale.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY hoped his noble Friend would not press his Amendment. Any one who was conversant with the condition of the poor of London must see how urgent it was that something should be done. He was very much disposed to agree with the objection as to the lateness of the Session, and that would be a good ground for passing a severe censure on the Poor Law Board; but it would be but a bad justification for any sufferings to which the poor might be subjected next winter if their Lordships were to refuse on that account to pass the Bill.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE, while agreeing with his noble Friend in many of the objections which he had made to the provisions of the Bill, hoped he would not press his Amendment to a division.

On Question, That ("now") stand Part of the Motion? Resolved in the Affirmative.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow; and Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38 to be considered in order to their being dispensed with.

REPORT.

Standing Orders, Nos. 7, 8, and 9, and Report of the Select Committee, further considered.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that when this subject was last before the House, they were discussing the Amendments to the seventh Standing Order, and several hon. Members who had voted against the adoption of three as the number of Members to serve on Private Bill Committees, had since informed him that they had done so under the belief that the number ought to continue to be five, and that they did not wish that the number should be fixed at four—the number which was substituted. But he had introduced various changes in the Resolutions for the purpose of making the other Orders conformable to the recent decision of the House, and he was afraid that he would not have time, before the close of the Session, to re-alter the scheme with a view to have the number fixed at three. Under these circumstances he would suggest to hon. Members that the best course to pursue would be to allow four to stand, for the present, as the number of the Committee. It would then be open for any hon. Member to move any alteration of the Resolutions he might think proper at the commencement of next Session; and upon that subject he had to remind the House that there would be ample time for the adoption of such a course, inasmuch as no Committee would be appointed until three weeks after Parliament had re-assembled. In conclusion, he had to propose that Resolution 7 should be left as it then stood.

MR. WARNER said, he did not mean to oppose that proposal; but he wished to give notice that on the consideration of the Standing Orders at the commencement of next Session, he would move that the number of Members serving on Private Bill Committees should be reduced from four to three.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he should wish to make a few remarks upon the general way in which the Private Bill business of the House was conducted. He fully agreed that it was necessary that some alteration should be made, but he thought that the hon. and gallant Member was proceeding in a wrong direction. It had been proposed that Private Bills should, in the first instance, undergo an inquiry by a body of Referees, one of whom was to be an engineer. But he believed that it would be impossible to find a first-class engineer who would be disposed to undertake that duty; and if, on the other hand, it were intrusted to an inferior member of the profession, it was manifest that the decision of such a gentleman would carry with it no kind of authority. He would suggest that a Committee of the Officers of the House should be appointed for that purpose by the Speaker. A large number of Bills were brought forward by speculative parties, and the first thing that ought to be ascertained was whether these Bills were introduced by bona fide capitalists. [Mr. AYRTON: What is a capitalist?] A capitalist was a man who was capable of carrying out what he undertook to do. The Committee, he suggested, would inquire into this subject, and much time and trouble would be saved by such an inquiry. Then the schemes brought before Committees were often of a competing character, and it was very probable that after such a preliminary inquiry many of them would not be heard of any further. There was another point to which he wished to advert. It was at present necessary that Bills should be deposited by the 23rd of December; and he would propose that within a month of that time petitioners should deposit their objections to each scheme. The result of such an arrangement would probably be that parties would often settle their differences without coming at all before the House. There were some thousands of Local Boards throughout the country, and petitions emanating from those Boards occupied very largely the attention of Select Committees, but he believed that many of the petitions were got up to enable the solicitor and clerk to the Board to spend a few days in London. He believed that the Committee of Officers would have no difficulty in knocking off one-half at least of these petitions. It was said that in the case of these Private Bills they might separate the merits from the facts, but that he denied, because the merits were often entirely involved in the facts. It was proper that undertakings, for whose promotion it was sought to obtain the authority of the House, should be backed by persons having ample capital at their command; but if the House was too rigid in demanding that the whole capital should be subscribed at once, they might impede most useful undertakings. If this principle had been insisted on, what would have been the result in such a case, for instance, as that of the Great Northern Railway, which saved to the country annually £3,000,000. He would have the House remember that there was no class of enterprize which they clogged with such enormous penalties as railways, and he might mention a fact which occurred in his own experience to show how cheaply things of this sort might be effected. He had been a party to a contract in a foreign country, which involved an expenditure of £4,000,000, and the whole preliminary expenses to which they had been put scarcely exceeded £200. He wished to see existing interests properly protected, but they must avoid putting a damper upon fair enterprize legitimately represented by capital. He thought that if a Committee of the character which he had described was appointed, it would dispose of much of the surplus business of the House.

MR. MILNER GIBSON suggested that it would be convenient if Members would confine their remarks to the question before them, which was that the number of the Committee should remain for the present four.

MR. SPEAKER said, the best time to introduce the general discussion on the Question would be on the Order as to Referees.

Standing Order, No. 7, as amended, agreed to.

Several Standing Orders amended, and agreed to, as far as 86 B.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN moved the adoption of a new Standing Order (86 B),

"The Chairman of Ways and Means, with not less than Three other persons, who shall be appointed by Mr. Speaker for such period as he shall think fit, shall be Referees of the House on Private Bills; such Referees to form one or more Courts; Two at least to be required to constitute each Court: provided that the Chairman of any second Court shall be a Member of this House."

MR. MASSEY said, that there was nothing in the Order to designate the character of the Referees. He thought it undesirable that they should be Members of the House, and would therefore propose to introduce the words "not being Members of this House."

Amendment proposed, after "persons," to insert "not being Members of this House."—(Mr. Massey.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN quite accorded with the suggestion, which he understood to be required by the rule of the House.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he understood that his hon. and gallant Friend had, on a former occasion, expressed his opinion that one of the Referees should be an engineer; he did not, however, state whether he meant a civil or a military engineer. If the former, it was quite clear that the engineer should be one of the second or third class, for a first class engineer could scarcely afford to give up his time to the discharge of such duties. If, however, his hon. and gallant Friend meant that he should be a military engineer, the civil engineers would say that he was not practically conversant with the important questions that would be submitted to him.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, if his hon. Friend looked at the proposed Order he would find that it did not provide for the appointment of an engineer as one of the Referees. He (Colonel Wilson Patten) had alluded merely to the possibility of one of those Referees being an engineer. He recollected the case of a Committee sitting for nine days on the consideration of an engineering question, and at the end of that time they were obliged to ask the Government to lend them an engineer to help them in their difficulty. The request having been complied with, the Government engineer settled the matters at issue within forty-eight hours, to the satisfaction of all parties. The result was the construction of the celebrated tubular bridge over the Menai. There was no necessity to mention an engineer at all in the Orders, but he had no doubt the Speaker would exercise his discretion in the appointment of such an officer in whom they would all have confidence.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, a great complaint was made about the pressure of Private business, but he himself had not served on a Committee for three years, and he could not help thinking that if the labour was more fairly distributed among Members there would be less dissatisfaction. He believed it would greatly facilitate business if, at the close of an inquiry into the merits of each Bill that occupied any considerable time, one or two Members of the Committee were relieved by fresh Members. The proposed Referees would practically supersede the Select Committees altogether, for if they discharged the duties sought to be confided to them there would hardly be anything left for the Committees to do. He was opposed to the appointment of engineers as Referees. Even if an engineer of any eminence were found willing to act as a Referee, he would probably be interested professionally in many of the works upon which he was called to decide, and the decision of a man occupying a lower position in his profession would not give satisfaction to the parties. Perhaps the office of Referee would be intrusted to that fortunate class of men who were supposed to be capable of doing everything—barristers of seven years' standing. To designate a man as a Referee would not endow him with any special knowledge or fitness for the performance of these duties. When a Private Bill Committee first met the Members did not know what it was they were going to try. Then came counsel, with their long and rambling speeches, and perhaps after two or three hours the Committee began to see daylight as to the question which they would have to try. There was nothing placed before them for their guidance in the nature of pleadings, as was the case in any proceedings before an ordinary court. The parties who went before them ought at least to be required, in the first instance, to put in a written statement of facts, showing what their case was, what they proposed to prove, and what they asked for; and some officer of the House should be appointed to whom those statements of facts should be referred, and who should deal with them very much as a Judge in Chambers dealt with pleadings which were objected to for some reason or other. By that means he was of opinion that the inquiry before the Committee would be simplified and the Committee's labours considerably lightened.

MR. AYRTON said, that the Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means had proposed an Amendment to prevent any other Member of that House except himself from being a Referee. It was difficult to understand how that hon. Gentleman should himself have proposed such an extraordinary Amendment. Let them look for a moment at what would be its effect. The Speaker was to appoint the Referees. It was not provided that they should be officers of that House, but it was intended that they should be divided into several courts; and, as the Chairman of Committees of Ways and Means could only be Chairman of one of those courts, the result would be that other courts would be set up in no way connected with that House, and in which no Member of that House would sit, so as to be able afterwards to afford it any information which might be required respecting the proceedings of one of those courts. It was provided that the decision of such a court, so disconnected from that House, was to be final, and binding upon the Committee as far as concerned the matters referred to it. Considerable embarrassment might ensue from such a state of things. If the proceedings of one of those courts, acting without the presence of a Member of the House, should be in any way impeached, there would be no one in Parliament to explain them, unless indeed the Referees were to be summoned to the Bar of the House. Thus, persons not responsible to the House would be made absolute masters of the proceedings of the House. It was said they could not have another Member of the House, besides the Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means as a Referee, because he must be paid; but there were many Members of the House who devoted their time and attention to carrying out its wishes without payment. The exclusion of Members from the office of Referees was a step in the wrong direction, and they ought to insist that where the Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means could not preside, some other Member of the House should preside in his stead, so that they might be satisfied that no error or injustice was committed in a finding which would bind the House as well as the parties interested. The House ought to take care how it allowed itself to be discredited in this matter, otherwise the country would regard the House of Lords as the only branch of the Legislature fit to conduct this important description of business. It appeared as if the House of Commons, having first abandoned the privilege of dealing with Private Bills as money Bills, was now going to abandon the privilege of dealing with them at all. Before depriving themselves of that power, hon. Members ought well to weigh the results which were likely to follow. If they conducted the proceedings of their Committees like any other tribunal in and out of this country, they would get rid of many of the difficulties which beset their private legislation. That House was almost the only tribunal which attempted to conduct litigious business without rules of procedure. Preliminary steps ought to be taken to clear the ground for the final inquiry before the Committee, and the parties should come before it with some precise issues to be tried. Instead of the vague preamble of a Bill which was now submitted to a Committee, they should have a detailed and specific pleading, such as was in use in the Law Courts at Westminster. A company approaching that House should be required several days beforehand to send in a tabulated estimate of the cost of their scheme and a succinct and accurate statement of its engineering features. If improvements like these were adopted it would be unnecessary to call in the aid of Referees at all. Moreover, the proposed system would frequently involve the necessity of double or triple references, and he was therefore afraid that the expenses to the suitor would only be increased.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, no two Members appeared to be of the same opinion with regard to the description of persons who should be appointed Referees. One suggested engineers, another barristers of seven years' standing, and the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets that one of them should be a Member of that House. He (Mr. Baillie) thought there would be great difficulty in getting any hon. Member to undertake so onerous a duty. He was disposed to agree with the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury, that the vast amount of private business arose from the laxity with which the Standing Orders of the House were carried out. In practice they acted as a positive encouragement for bringing forward schemes for the sole purpose of being afterwards disposed of. He did not think the proposed change would be found to work successfully.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, his experience of Private Bill Committees was that the time of the Committee and the money of the parties were frequently wasted in the process of proving matters which might be proved before the parties went before the Committee at all. Engineers were called to contradict engineers, and much needless expense was incurred in consequence. Great saving of time and money would be obtained by a preliminary inquiry before Referees, and there would be no necessity for having questions re-opened after the Referees had reported. It had been stated that an inquiry in the last Session had cost over £60,000—and he would venture to say that one half of the money was spent in proving facts that might have been previously established. There was not a strict analogy between these Committees and ordinary tribunals, and it would be impracticable to tie them down by the fixed rules adopted in the Law Courts. He contended that it was unfair to charge these Committees with arriving at random conclusions, without rules, for at present their practice was tolerably uniform, and they had rules which were now generally followed. He wished to see the existing machinery strengthened and made more efficient and economical in its working, and for that purpose he thought the Committees should be armed with additional powers. As to the Referees, whether they were or were not Members of that House he would have perfect confidence in them.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, that besides saving the time of the House, hon. Members should see that they also saved the time and the pockets of the public. But he did not see how this was to be effected by the establishment of a third tribunal, which might have no effect in the other House, and would, in his judgment, both increase the expense, and waste the time of the public. Referees were to be appointed to go into the details now investigated by ten or a dozen Committees. Committees often neglected details for want of time; and no three men could do ten times the work so neglected by the Committees. It was out of the question. It was proposed further that three Referees should enter into traffic and engineering details, which sometimes took six weeks in one particular case. In his opinion, the only way of reforming the procedure in Private legislation was for the two Houses to concur in a mode of saving time and expense.

MR. ROEBUCK doubted, whether the mere fragment of the House of Commons which remained on that, the almost last day of the Session, was in a position safely to alter the whole Private legislation of the country. Was it decent? He would appeal to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, whether at so late a period so great a change should be made? It would be better to defer the subject to the early part of the next Session, in a full and fresh House. The hon. and learned Member moved that the Debate be adjourned for a month.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY seconded the Motion. As there was a probability of a general election early next year, and the greater portion of the metropolitan lines were now conceded, he thought it likely that the Notices for Private Bills next November would be comparatively few in number. They were quite at sea as to what the proposed Referees were to do, but they ought not to hurry the discussion of the subject.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Roebuck.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH also thought it would be best to let the subject stand over until next Session. He was prepared to agree to a reduction in the number of the members of Select Committees, but the question of appointing Referees required further consideration. He thought that the appointment of Referees to sit simultaneously with Committees would add to the complexity of Private business, and would certainly not diminish the expense. At the same time he could not see why the parties should not be required to agree upon certain facts, such as the population of towns, distances, &c., the inquiry into which under the present system greatly lengthened the sittings of Committees.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN hoped the House would not adopt the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman. Very many equally important measures were passed by more thinly attended Houses than the present. It was singular that the hon. Baronet the Member for Westminster should support a further postponement, because it was at his suggestion that the subject had been referred to a Committee. The hon. Baronet also nominated three Members to serve upon that Committee, but neither of those Members had suggested any objections, and even the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets allowed the report to be passed unanimously. He had no special affection for his own proposition, and had only brought it forward under the belief that it would tend to the public advantage. Reference had been made to the desirability of equalizing the labour thrown upon Members by serving upon the Select Committee, but he could assure the House that the Committee of selection endeavoured as much as possible to divide the labour. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, who ought, perhaps, to have made his suggestion in the Select Committee, alleged that these propositions, if carried, would lower the authority of the House of Commons. It was difficult to understand how that could be, seeing that the House of Lords, as well as that House, now referred two branches of Private Bills to Commissioners out of Parliament. Having been for thirty years connected with the Standing Orders Committee, he had always found the same objections raised whenever attempts were made to alter the mode of dealing with Private business. Thus it was always urged that no fixed rules were laid down for the guidance of Committees, but whenever he appealed to lawyers to frame such rules he found that no two of them could agree. He thought the plan he proposed would be for the convenience of the Members and for the advantage of the public.

MR. LOWE hoped the House would not hastily reject a carefully considered proposition, which was placed before them upon great authority, and which was called for by a serious emergency. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield was in error in supposing that the House would resume this question with equal effect at the beginning of next Session. If Parliament meant to keep the Private business in its own hands, some material changes in the mode of managing it must be made, and, above all, the serious defect of having the same case tried twice over by two independent tribunals. The main objection urged against the plan of Joint Committees of the two Houses was, that it would be impossible for the other House to furnish its due proportion of working Members to sit upon these Committees. It was therefore obvious that the first thing to be done was to reduce within manageable limits the amount of business to be thrown upon the Committees, and the question then arose how could that reduction be brought about. It would be impossible to introduce anything in the nature of pleadings without increasing the existing confusion. The only way was to require that measurable and ascertainable facts, such as engineering works, traffic, &c., should be inquired into primarily and agreed upon, and that duty could best be performed by persons whom experience would render familiar with such details. The effect of such a plan would be to diminish the amount of labour now cast upon Members of the House, but if the House rejected this Referee proposal he did not see how the amount of business was to be reduced.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH feared that if the Motion for postponement was agreed to there would be nothing done in this matter for a couple of years, inasmuch as there was every probability of a general election next year. He, however, hoped that some further explanation would be given as to the character of the Referees whom it was proposed to appoint.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he thought the House was much indebted to the hon. and gallant Gentleman for the pains he had taken with regard to this matter. There was a great deal to be said in favour of the scheme now under consideration, but at the same time he was fully alive to the fact that this was the last day but one of the Session, and that much might be said against as well as for the plan. There appeared to be doubts in the minds of many hon. Members who had expressed their opinions, as to whether this was the best scheme that could be desired, and whether it might not be possible to devise some other mode of management. The hon. and gallant Gentleman told them the Committee had been unanimous in their opinion upon these propositions, and if the hon. and gallant Gentleman should think it right to take the sense of the House upon them, the Members of the Government could not, in fairness, vote against them. He would, however, put it to the hon. and gallant Gentleman as a matter of discretion as well as of expediency, whether it would not be the better course to consent to postpone dealing with the subject until another Session? It would not be prejudicial to the plan to consent to such a postponement, for it must be borne in mind that there was always at the beginning of a Session a certain interval before Public business could be commenced, and that interval would afford a convenient opportunity of considering the best mode of dealing with the Private business.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he was always desirous of yielding, if possible, to the noble Lord's opinion, but in this instance the noble Lord was mistaken as to the effect of a postponement. To defer dealing with this subject until next Session, meant putting it off until the year 1866. There would be Referees to be appointed and rules to be drawn up which would prevent any action being taken next Session upon the Resolutions, if agreed to. He should leave it to the House to decide whether this subject should be now dealt with, or be put off for another year.

Question put:—The House divided:—
Ayes 14; Noes 51: Majority 37.

MR. MASSEY hoped that three Members would be appointed on the Committee of Referees who should not be Members of that House.

MR. MILNER GIBSON hoped that the Chairman of Ways and Means would not think it necessary to press his Amendment, as Members of the House might be found willing to act as Referees without payment, and it would be unadvisable to pass a Resolution precluding their appointment.

CAPTAIN JERVIS wished to know if the court would be open to the public. He believed that the public, whose interests were concerned, would not have the same confidence in a body of paid Commissioners as they would in a court formed of Members of that House, from whom they would be more apt to expect an impartial verdict.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that the public would have access to the court as they now had to the Committees.

MR. ROEBUCK wished to know, whether the House was prepared to give power to any person to establish rules which they would not alter in the event of their being disapproved of by the House, because, if such rules should be made in the vacation, they would come into operation before the House met next Session?

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN suggested to the hon. Member for Sheffield the advisability of urging his objection when the clause to which he referred came on for discussion.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY did not know how the House was to acknowledge the proceedings of any of those courts which were not presided over by one of their own Members. He thought it better that that question should be left an open one.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he was willing to let that question remain an open one.

MR. MASSEY said, he would withdraw his Amendment, as he found that the sense of the House was in favour of the matter being left open.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD wished to call the attention of the House to the fact that, at present, the suggestion was that the Chairman of Ways and Means and three Referees should form two courts, so that the casting vote in either court must necessarily be exercised by the chairman in case of any difference of opinion between himself and the other Referee. This was the more to be regretted as the subjects to be decided by these courts were such as to involve much litigation and expense, and the House would find the same scheme brought before them year after year in consequence of the dissatisfaction which the decision of one person must necessarily give. He would therefore suggest that each court should be composed of not less than three Members.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN would agree to the suggestion of the hon. Member.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH suggested the omission of the words "two at least to constitute each court."

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

MR. ROEBUCK then moved in the place of the word "two" in line 4, to insert "three."

MR. SPEAKER would point out to the House that such a Resolution would be tantamount to a direction to the Speaker to appoint five Referees instead of three as at present suggested.

MR. ROEBUCK observed, that in order to constitute two courts there must be six persons appointed.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, the Order was to appoint not less than three persons.

MR. MASSEY said, it would be necessary to divide the Referees into two courts, in case the business should be too heavy for one to dispose of. He thought it would be unwise for the House to put an absolute prohibition upon the action of Mr. Speaker. A second court was only to be opened when the business was too much for one.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, that if only one court was to be opened it would be better for it to be composed of three Referees, because if the court were composed of four, the Chairman would have a casting vote. Mr. Speaker's power of appointment would be exhausted in the first instance, unless they inserted the words "from time to time."

MR. MASSEY said, that the power of making further appointments was already provided for by the words "for such period as he shall think fit."

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he would move a proviso in reference to the second court, that the Chairman should be a Member of the House.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN thought that his hon. Friend was raising difficulties which would never occur. If they provided for every little difficulty, the occurrence of which was only possible, there would be no end to the provisions which they would have to frame.

MR. INGHAM was of opinion that there was no necessity for the Chairman of the second court being a Member of the House.

SIR MORTON PETO cited the example of the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Adair), whom no amount of work appeared to frighten.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH would suggest that no such Referee, if a Member of the House, should receive a salary.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that the Chairman of Ways and Means was empowered in his absence to appoint one of the Referees to supply his place, and he thought that the Referee so appointed ought also to be a Member of the House.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD then moved, that the Chairman of the second court should be a Member of the House.

MR. LOWE regarded this Amendment as equivalent to resisting the formation of any second court at all, because he did not believe they would find a Member willing to undertake the drudgery which the office involved.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, that if Members could sit on Committees upstairs for four months there would be no difficulty in obtaining their services for a few weeks in the court below.

MR. MILNER GIBSON agreed to the doctrine that the Chairman of the second court should be a Member of the House; the question was, Who was to appoint him?

MR. SPEAKER would remind the House that he had no power to compel any Member to undertake the duty, and the possibility of putting such a provision into execution would entirely depend upon the willingness of any Member to fill the office. It would be compelling the Speaker to request, as a favour, some Member of the House to undertake the duty, and he thought that that was hardly the form in which the matter should be left.

MR. INGHAM said, the duties would occupy from ten in the morning to five in the afternoon daily, and perhaps not excepting Saturday. That would prevent the hon. Member who undertook the office from attending to his public duties.

MR. LYGON said, that if the duties did not deter the Chairman of Ways and Means from accepting the office in one court, he thought it ought not to deter any hon. Member from presiding over the second court.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY thought it would be much better to have only one court.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH moved a proviso—

“And provided that no such Referee, if he be a Member of this House, shall receive any salary.”

MR. LYGON pointed out that if such a Referee were appointed with a salary his seat would be vacated on that account.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that the Chairman of Ways and Means was appointed with a salary, and did not vacate his seat. He was not an officer under the Crown.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it was quite clear that the Act only referred to appointments held under the Crown.

Proviso agreed to.

MR. SPEAKER said, he had now to put the Question that this House do agree with the Resolution of the Committee as amended. He would venture to point out that there had been considerable alteration made in it. It was his business to take upon him any duty the House might choose to impose upon him, but he would have been glad if in the course of the debate some indication had been given by the House with regard to the persons whom they might desire to be appointed as Referees. He had only been able to gather the opinion that the House was averse to the appointment of one class—engineers. When he accepted the duty, he believed that his services would be confined to the appointment of three Referees; and now it was extended possibly to five, and with the class of persons undetermined he could not help feeling that the duty was somewhat difficult to perform.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, there were two officers appointed by the Speaker to examine Private Bills; their appointment had given the utmost satisfaction; and he had no doubt that like satisfaction would be felt with regard to any appointment that might be made by the Speaker under this Bill.

Standing Order 86 B agreed to.

Standing Order 86 C,

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN moved that the Chairman of Ways and Means should be Chairman of the Referees.

COLONEL FRENCH had heard nothing with reference to the amount of remuneration to be paid to the Referees. This was a mere experiment, and he wished to know whether the Referees appointed would be entitled to retiring pensions in case of failure?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the scheme was experimental. If unsuccessful it would be put an end to, and there would be no pension or compensation. The salaries would have to be determined by a vote of the House.

MR. MASSEY thought that the rule before the House might be omitted, as it was inappropriate after the decision at which the House had arrived in the course of its discussion of the previous rule.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS thought the question of remuneration ought to be fixed.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that in other Departments no difficulty had occurred in this respect.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD asked, in the event of there being two courts, who was to be the Chairman of the second court?

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN moved the substitution of the words “first court” for “Referees” in the first part of the rule, which provided that the Chairman of Ways and Means should be the Chairman of the Referees.

CAPTAIN JERVIS thought it would be better to omit the whole Order.

The Order put, and negatived.

Order 86 D (Rules of Practice and Procedure to be made by Chairman of Ways and Means).

MR. ROEBUCK asked, whether these rules were to be acted on before the House had acceded to them? By such a course they would hand over to the Chairman of Ways and Means a power which should be retained in that House.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, the principle of framing these rules was taken from the system of the Courts of Law, and their only object was that the business should be carried on satisfactorily.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY moved after “may require” to insert “but only the Counsel shall appear before such Referees in support of a Private Bill, or in support of any petition in opposition thereto.”

SIR MORTON PETO asked whether any counsel at all were necessary, as the solicitors and agents were quite competent to conduct the business. He believed that if counsel were let in, not one or two but half-a-dozen courts would be necessary.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, it was at the suggestion of the Parliamentary agents themselves that counsel were to be admitted. The Chairman of Ways and Means, however, would be empowered to regulate the proceedings before the Referees.

MR. MILNER GIBSON thought that parties ought not to be deprived of the power of employing counsel as they pleased, especially as property to a large extent was involved in many cases that came before these Committees.

MR. BRADY said, that the lawyers and agents who had recommended that counsel should be heard before the Board of Referees, were the very parties who were specially interested in increasing the cost of those inquiries.

MR. LOCKE said, that perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like the parties to toss up to determine which side should win. The employment of counsel was for the interest of the parties, who naturally desired that their case should be stated in the best manner, and the right to retain counsel for the purpose of these proceedings ought not to be restricted.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD supported the proposal of the hon. Baronet, that only one counsel should be allowed to appear. It would not be desirable to leave it to the Chairman of Ways and Means, who was himself a barrister, to adopt what might appear an invidious rule to his profession.

MR. INGHAM thought the proposal of the hon. Baronet a reasonable one.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH, acknowledging the efforts of the President of the Board of Trade to regulate the fees of the Parliamentary Bar, asked, Whether the right hon. Gentleman could inform the House of any satisfactory result?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he could not give much information on this subject beyond that which was already in the possession of the House. The doctrine which he held was simply this, that the fees of the Parliamentary Bar should be regulated as the fees in the ordinary Courts of Law and Equity were regulated. He was informed that the doors of the Committee-rooms were now thrown open, and that members of the Equity and Common Law Bars could now come in and practise there without incurring the displeasure of the Parliamentary Bar.

MR. COX pointed out that, by allowing only one counsel to appear for each party, the promoters would have but a single counsel against perhaps half-a-dozen retained for different petitioners against the Bill.

CAPTAIN JERVIS thought the restriction a most salutary one, for the result would be the employment of one counsel, who would be present throughout the proceedings and attend exclusively to the case.

Motion agreed to.

Order 86 D, as amended, agreed to.

Order 86 E,

"The Referees shall inquire into all or any of the following matters as to which parties petitioning against any Bill desire to be heard in opposition, viz.—1. In the case of Bills of the Second Class for authorizing the construction of Works, the engineering details of the undertaking, the efficiency of the Works for the proposed object, and the sufficiency of the estimate for executing the same; 2. In the case of Bills for authorizing a new line of railway, the statistics of the traffic proposed to be accommodated; 3. In the case of Waterworks Bills, the nature and amount of the existing and the proposed source of supply, the quality of the water in each case, and the provisions as to storage reservoirs; 4. In the case of Gas Bills, the quality of the gas, the existing supply and its price, the amount of pressure, the cost of production, and the modes of testing the purity and illuminating power of the gas."

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that after the length of time which had already been occupied in that discussion, he would propose that No. 2 in 86 C, which was the only debateable point he believed that still remained, should be left open for consideration in another Session, when he would move it as a special Resolution.

SIR MORTON PETO suggested, that Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 should be postponed till another Session.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY remarked that this regulation referred to railways, and would involve the whole question.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that the inquiries contemplated in No. 1 would really place the whole Bill within the jurisdiction of the Referees, whose decision was to be practically without appeal. A noble Lord in the other House was said to be the House of Lords as far as Private Bills were concerned. He was not prepared to make these Referees in the same way the House of Commons.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, the sole effect of the provision would be, that where questions relating to engineering matters were concerned, they would go before the Referees instead of the Committee. He begged, as the discussion had taken this turn, to move "That Order 86 stand part of the Bill."

MR. MILNER GIBSON was disposed to agree in the objections of the hon. and learned Member. The efficiency of the works for the proposed object and the sufficiency of the estimate were really inferences from facts. It seemed to him, therefore, that the Referees ought to report the facts, as well as the inference which they drew from those facts.

SIR MORTON PETO moved the postponement of Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4, which, he thought, would be better inquired into next Session. This proposal would practically constitute two trials of the whole affair instead of one, whereas he had understood that the business of the Referees would be simply to denude the inquiry before the Committee of all unnecessary matter.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that if these paragraphs were struck out the omission would make perfect nonsense of the whole scheme. The facts into which the Referees were to inquire had nothing to do with the merits; they were only the facts upon which the merits depend, and they could be as well ascertained by other parties as by Members of the House.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH thought the engineering details and the sufficiency of the estimate were matters which could properly be ascertained by the Referees.

MR. SPEAKER having put the Question that Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 be struck out,

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, it appeared to him that such a proposition amounted to asking the House to reconsider their decision. They had decided to constitute Courts of Referees, and it was now necessary to decide what questions should be referred to them. If those four clauses were now to be postponed until next Session they would simply have wasted four hours in a discussion upon them. That would give to their proceedings the character of a farce.

SIR MORTON PETO said that, under the circumstances, he would not press the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he would have no objection to strike out No. 2 in order to save the time of the House, and he would undertake to bring it forward again next Session. With regard to the remaining clauses, they were mere matters of fact upon which he believed there would be no difference of opinion.

No. 2 struck out.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN then moved the adoption of Standing Order, 86 F,

"So soon as the inquiry into the matters referred to them upon any Bill has been completed, the Referees shall make their Report upon the same to the House, and the Report shall thereupon stand referred to the Select Committee on the Bill. No further evidence shall be taken by the Committee to prove or disprove any of the facts reported by the Referees."

MR. MILNER GIBSON moved the insertion, after the word "House," of the words "stating the facts on which their opinion is founded." He thought it but right that the Select Committee should be put in possession of that information.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD thought that if the opinion of the Referees was to be final, the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman would only open the door to useless criticism.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN concurred with the hon. Gentleman in thinking that such an Amendment would only provoke unnecessary discussions.

MR. MILNER GIBSON did not propose that it should be competent to the Committee to prove or disprove the facts into which the Referees had already inquired; but unless a report of the facts was before the Committee it could not arrive at a conclusion as to whether the inference drawn by the Referees was a correct one, and he was not prepared to deprive the Committees of the House of the power to judge of the inference which should be drawn from ascertained facts.

MR. INGHAM said, the Referees would have to state the result of certain facts, but the Committee would have no power to go into the details by which the Referees had arrived at them. The policy of the measure would remain in the discretion of the Committee.

MR. MASSEY said, the Amendment was no innovation on the existing practice. If the Referees were to report their conclusions without stating the facts upon which they were based, he did not think their Reports would have the confidence of that House. If the Committee had the power to refer the Report back for further consideration he thought it would be sufficient.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, the object of the Standing Order was to allow the details to be thoroughly investigated before the Referees.

MR. CHILDERS said, the material facts were not, at present, the proper inquiry for a Select Committee. It would be the duty of the Referees to look into the details and see that they were sound.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY asked whether, if a Bill was unopposed, the details would be looked into and examined by the Referees?

Amendment agreed to.

Question put, that the Order, as amended, be agreed to,

MR. ROEBUCK observed that, in the case of a Water Bill, if the Referees had taken evidence as to the sufficiency of a puddle wall, the Select Committee would be precluded from making any inquiry as to whether the wall was sufficient or not; but if after the construction of the work the wall should fall, the world would say it had been approved by a Select Committee, when, in fact, the catastrophe would be due to the neglect of the Referees.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN then proposed Standing Order 86 G—

"The Select Committee to which any Bill has been referred may, subject to the approval of the Chairman of Ways and Means, refer any question arising in the course of their inquiry which they may deem suitable to be so referred to the Referees for their decision; such question to be stated in writing, and signed by the Chairman of the Committee. The Referees, so soon as their inquiry has been completed, to return the question, with their decision certified thereon, to the Chairman."

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD moved an Amendment, limiting the questions to be so referred to questions of fact.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, the Standing Order was framed at the suggestion of several experienced members of the railway body. A point had arisen the other day between the Great Northern and Great Eastern Railways with regard to the connection of the lines, which it would have been desirable, if it could have been done, to refer to arbitration. It was to meet a similar case that the Standing Order had been introduced.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought it would be putting an unlimited amount of labour upon the Chairman of Ways and Means, before the fact was ascertained that he would accept the duty. These Committees were to be permitted to make references to the Referees without the Referees being bound to undertake the duties.

MR. LOWE was of opinion that the machinery of reference would break down under the additional work thus proposed to be put upon it.

MR. MASSEY hoped the House would not overburden the Chairman of Ways and Means.

Amendment negatived.

Standing Order 86 G agreed to.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, this was the last of these Resolutions. If the experiment should fail, he would be one of the first to vote for its repeal. He thought, however, that it would be beneficial.

On the Motion of Colonel WILSON PATTEN Orders 113 and 113 A struck out.

Standing Order in lieu of 113 A (Absence of Members by Death or otherwise to be reported)—

"If, at any time after the Committee on a Bill shall have been formed, a quorum of Members required by the Standing Orders cannot attend in consequence of any of the Members who shall have duly qualified to serve on such Committee having become incompetent to continue such service by having been placed on an Election Committee, or by death, or otherwise, the Chairman shall report the circumstances of the case to the House in order that such measures may be taken by the House as shall enable the Members still remaining on the Committee to proceed with the business referred to such Committee, or as the emergency of the case may require."

—put, and agreed to.

Standing Order 143,

MR. SCOURFIELD moved to insert after the word "railway," in line 13 of 48, the following words:—

"The amounts subscribed and paid by the persons named and described in the Schedule to the Bill, the bona fides of such subscription, and the correctness of the names, residences, and description of the subscribers."

SIR MORTON PETO hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment, and the other Resolutions of which the hon. Member had given notice, as they would be fatal to many great undertakings already in progress. He would be quite ready to consider the whole subject in another Session.

MR. MASSEY said, that the change which his hon. Friend proposed to make was one of a very extensive character, but it did not properly relate to the mere Standing Orders of the House. He would recommend his hon. Friend to withdraw the Amendment, and next Session to take the deliberate opinion of the House upon the subject.

MR. SCOURFIELD intimated that he would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Standing Order agreed to.

MR. TORRENS moved that the following be a new Order:—

“That on every Private Bill to be considered by a Committee all Petitions presented by the Promoters, Opponents, or other parties Petitioning on matters connected with such Bill be printed, and a Copy of every Petition be placed in the hands of the Members of the Committee on its assembling.”

MR. MASSEY said, that the proposal was one of a novel character, and would entail a considerable addition of expenditure on the parties. He did not say, however, that it ought on that account to be rejected. But he would ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his Motion for the present so as to allow him (Mr. Massey) to confer with those persons concerned in the conduct of private business, and next Session he would have an opportunity of conferring with the hon. Member himself, and the result might be a proposition which would be generally acceptable.

MR. TORRENS intimated that after that assurance he would not press the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Standing Orders relating to Private Bills repealed.

Ordered, That the several Orders, as reported by the Committee and amended by this House, be the Standing Orders of this House relating to Private Bills, and be printed. [No. 545.]

THAMES CONSERVANCY BILL.

Lords Amendments considered:

Amendments agreed to, as far as page 23, line 32.

MR. AYRTON objected to a provision marked C, inserted by the other House, which conferred a privilege on coal vessels not enjoyed by vessels engaged in other branches of commerce—namely, to unload in the river and escape dock duties. It was better to leave the Thames as a free highway for the equal benefit of all descriptions of commerce, and he begged to move that the House should disagree with this Amendment of the Lords.

Page 23, line 32, the next Amendment, being read a second time; Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment.”—(Mr. Ayrton.)

MR. LINDSAY supported the clause, which he said would promote the general trade of the port of London.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, that this provision had been inserted by the Lords in opposition to the opinion of the Select Committee. He could inform the House that a large portion of his constituents were opposed to the clause, and considered that their interests had been overlooked by its introduction at a period of the Session when it was almost impossible to discuss it properly.

MR. LOCKE said, that this was an attempt to restrict everybody else connected with this matter for the benefit of a favoured class. He did not know why colliers should not go into dock the same as other vessels.

MR. HUTT hoped that his hon. Friend would not press his Amendment, as by so doing it might imperil the Bill itself at that late period of the Session. He believed that the Bill would greatly increase the facilities of the navigation of the Thames. He proposed to add a few words to the clause restraining the exercise of any undue power by any individuals under the Act.

MR. AYRTON said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments agreed to, as far as Clause 75.

MR. LOCKE objected to an Amendment of the Lords which threw out a provision prohibiting any extension being made in the sewers or drains leading into the Thames outside the metropolitan districts. The Court of Chancery had granted an injunction against this drainage being carried out at Kingston, which would remain in force till Michaelmas term next; but the rejection of the clause would permit Kingston and also all other towns on the banks of the Thames to empty their sewage into the river. Seeing that the inhabitants of London were taxed to the extent of four millions to prevent this being done in the case of London, he thought it was inconsistent to allow other towns to drain into the Thames. He moved that the House should disagree with the Lords Amendment.

Clause 75, the last Amendment, being read a second time; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with The Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Locke.)

MR. HUTT agreed in all the hon. and learned Gentleman had said on the importance of keeping the Thames free from pollution, but he appealed to the hon. and learned Gentleman not to press his Motion, as it might defeat the measure for the Session. He would undertake that the subject should be brought under the serious consideration of the Government during the recess.

MR. BRADY hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would press his Motion.

MR. LOCKE said, he would, under the promise held out, withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment agreed to.

THE PROROGATION.—QUESTION.

In reply to Lord CHELMSFORD,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR stated, that the Prorogation was fixed for to-morrow.

LORD REDESDALE said, he was sorry to hear that announcement, for two Bills had come up from the Commons with their Lordships' Amendments disagreed to, and it would be now impossible to consider the matter properly.

RAILWAY COMPANIES POWERS BILL.

Returned from the Commons, with some of the Amendments, agreed to; some agreed to with Amendments; and some disagreed to, for which Disagreement the Commons have assigned Reasons.

Moved, "That the Commons Reasons for disagreeing to certain of the Amendments made by the Lords, and Commons Amendments to Lords Amendments, be now considered."—(Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

LORD REDESDALE said, he could not understand why the Prorogation should take place to-morrow. He found that on the Minutes of the House a judgment was put down to be delivered on Saturday. There was no idea yesterday that the Prorogation would take place to-morrow. It was quite impossible to consider these Amendments. They had not even been printed. He protested against the haste that was being exhibited.

LORD STANLEY of ALDERLEY said, that with regard to the first Amendment, at all events, the noble Lord knew what it was.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had no objection to that Amendment, but their Lordships generally knew nothing whatever about the Amendments, and therefore it was most unreasonable to ask them to agree to them.

LORD CHELMSFORD also thought it most unreasonable that their Lordships should be asked to record their agreement with Amendments of which they knew nothing.

An Amendment moved to leave out from ("That") to the End of the Motion for the Purpose of inserting ("the Consideration of the Commons Reasons and Amendments be adjourned till To-morrow, and that the Reasons and Amendments be printed."—(Lord Redesdale.)

After short debate, on Question, Whether to agree to the said Amendment?

THE NEW CANON OF WESTMINSTER. QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If the newly appointed Canon of Westminster, who is ex officio Rector of St. Margaret's Westminster, is to receive a fixed stipend or a proportion of the gross income of the canonry; and, if so, what proportion?

MR. T. G. BARING, in reply, said, he believed the stipend of the newly appointed Canon of Westminster would be fixed, and that it would amount to £1,000 a year. As, however, the question depended upon the construction of several Acts of Parliament, he could not give a positive answer.

INDIA—THE INDIAN ARMY.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether, now that the Regiments of the Three Native Armies of India are termed Irregulars, it is intended to continue the exceptional practice of appointing Officers to Regiments to be Commandants and second in command of Regiments, irrespective of their rank, notwithstanding other Officers appointed to the same Regiments may have superior brevet or substantive rank; and on what grounds a Staff Officer serving with a Native Regiment is permitted to qualify himself for promotion to substantive rank and pay, while an Officer on the Cadre of a Regiment, and not on the Staff, is only qualifying himself for promotion to brevet rank without pay?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in reply, that in answer to the first Question of the hon. and gallant Member, he had to state that in the Irregular Regiments in India the rank of commandant was given to an officer quite irrespectively of his rank in the regular army. It was not proposed to abolish the power of making the appointment of commandants in the manner stated in the Question, and thus prevent the Government from putting the right man in the right place; but that course would only be adopted in very exceptional cases. In reply to the second Question, he had to state that the position of an officer under such circumstances in a Native Regiment had no connection with his regimental rank or pay.

AFFAIRS OF MEXICO.—QUESTION.

MR. KINGLAKE asked, Whether, on the part of the Government, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs can convey an assurance that before the Government advises the Queen to recognize the Archduke Ferdinand Maximilian as Emperor of Mexico they will be prepared to satisfy the House that his authority is de facto established in the main portion of the States and Territories now held under the sway of President Juarez?

MR. LAYARD replied that there was some difficulty in ascertaining exactly what portion of Mexico was actually in the hands of the new Mexican Government, or rather of the French troops. According to the latest accounts he had been able to collect, the French troops were in possession of the capital, Vera Cruz, Tampico, Alvarado, Minatitlan, Laguna del Terminos, San Juan Baptista, Sisal, Campeachy, and Puebla. The French troops were also blockading Acapulco, Tuspan, Nantla, and Tabasco. On the 1st of May last Juarez was established at Monterey, and Matamoros was also then in the possession of the Mexicans. That was the only information he could give to his hon. Friend with regard to the places actually in possession of the new Mexican Government. As his hon. Friend was aware, in that unfortunate country for many years past it had been almost impossible to say that at any time any particular Government had been in possession of the whole of the Republic. Recent Presidents had rarely held more than the capital, Vera Cruz, and one or two of the ports of the country surrounding the capital. The rest of the Republic had generally been in a state of insurrection. It had hitherto been the custom, from necessity, to recognize the Government that was in possession of the capital, and the Archduke Maximilian was now in possession not only of the capital, but of a considerable portion of the country. Her Majesty's Government had informed the Emperor of the French confidentially that when the Archduke Maximilian was actually in Mexico, and had notified to the European Powers that he had taken possession of the Government, it was their intention to advise Her Majesty to recognize the Archduke as Emperor of Mexico. He could give his hon. Friend no assurance that before that acknowledgment of the Emperor de facto was made the Archduke would have to be able to show that the greater part of Mexico was actually in his hands. The peculiar state of the country was such that he did not believe it would be possible for the Archduke Maximilian to do that. There were always a number of chiefs in arms, who took possession of a district and held it against the Government, and a state of anarchy was the consequence. He hoped, however, that when the Government of the Archduke Maximilian was established in Mexico a better condition of things would ensue. At any rate, it was very desirable for the interests of British subjects that there should be at least some de facto Government in Mexico in possession of the capital and some of the ports of the country.

"To draw up Reasons to be assigned to The Lords for disagreeing to the Amendments to which this House hath disagreed :"—MR. MILNER GIBSON, MR. HUTT, SIR WILLIAM DUNBAR, LORD CLARENCE PAGET, and MR. ADAIR:—To withdraw immediately :—Three to be the quorum.

EMIGRATION (AMERICA).

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

LORD EDWARD HOWARD said, he rose to call attention to the subject of Emigration to the United States of America in reference to the prolongation of the war now raging in that country, and to move an Address for Papers. He certainly should not have attempted to intrude on their attention at that late period of the Session had it not been that a case had presented itself which it appeared to him necessary he should bring before the House. In the course of his duty as a member of the Distress Relief Committee at Glossop, one of the towns most affected by the cotton distress, it became necessary to have a census made of the population of the district, and one of the elements of that census was the character of the emigration which prevailed. It appeared from that census that there had been a very large emigration from that district, and from the inquiry which supervened he found it was also large from the cotton districts in general. In twenty-two towns, taken promiscuously from the cotton districts—and he did not know that they were the largest towns—there had been within a few months, setting aside single men, no less than 1,460 married men who had left this country for the United States of America, of whom no fewer than 780 had deserted their wives and families, leaving 2,160 chargeable on the rates. He had also the names of fourteen persons who had emigrated within three months from one spot near Manchester, and of these no fewer than twelve had deserted their wives and children. In all probability the 780 married men who had deserted their families were young and able men not long married, and in the most active period of their lives. That emigration, attended by such calamitous results, must show that there were deep causes at work for the present state of things, which was to be lamented, not only for its anti-social results, but for the country generally. It would not meet the argument to say that these men had emigrated with a view afterwards to send for their families, because he knew that there had been instances in which the manufacturers of America had sent for manufacturing hands from England, had paid for the passage of those who went over including not only the working hands, but their families also, and the money thus advanced was afterwards repaid out of the men's wages on their arrival in America. He had further to say that great caution was exercised by the agents who were instrumental in taking these people out of the country, for they did not give written documents or money until the emigrants were safe on board the vessels which were to convey them to America. He would read a few extracts to show how some, at all events, of those who emigrated were disposed of when they got to the other side of the water, and in order to present the case in the most condensed form he should mainly confine himself to printed or written statements. Here was a well-authenticated case:—A young man who was a private in the Manchester Volunteers was decoyed over to New York, and he held in his hand a letter which was written by an officer of the corps relative to the case—

“A companion of his had seen an advertisement in some newspaper requiring first-rate mechanics for a workshop in Canada. He searched out and found the advertiser, who assured him that work was plentiful in Canada, and that he would have permanent employment at 35s. a week. At the next interview with the advertiser (which took place on the steps of the Manchester Exchange) the man went with his friend, and they agreed to go. They were only told to provide for their voyage, because on their arrival in Canada they would obtain employment immediately, and could get cash on account of their wages. Six men were thus induced to go. When they arrived at Liverpool there was a conveyance waiting for them, and they were driven down to the pier head. On getting on board the steamer (called the Virginia), however, they found she was bound for New York, and in reply to their inquiries were told that they would be reshipped at New York for Canada. However, when they arrived at New York, the advertiser sent them to a place to get some refreshment, paid for it, and also intimated that he had paid their passage to Long Island. He then disappeared, and they never saw him afterwards. The poor fellows knew nothing about Long Island, and went. They were penniless and friendless. Two enlisted at once. Four escaped to New York, and then enlisted. One man concealed himself in the hold of a Cunard steamer and returned to England, sadly ashamed of himself, and a miserable victim of Yankee rascality.”

Long Island, mentioned in this letter, was a place where recruits bound themselves for service in the Federal army. He could quote a case even more startling than that, but he did not wish to trespass too long on the time of the House. It was not a solitary case. He held in his hand the statement of a man named Macartney, whose case was before the Foreign Office, who was landed at New York with a letter of credit for £10. He was drugged, robbed, and while in a state of stupefaction enlisted in the Federal army. There was reason to believe that in all the passenger ships from the Mersey to America there were emissaries from the Federal Government on board with the view of enlisting young men as recruits. A case had been told to him two days ago by an hon. and gallant Member of that House. A man sailed from London in a ship for America. He did not like the provisions, but a very civil and kind person who was on board produced a quantity of potted meats, and induced the emigrant to partake of them. When about to land, this person asked the emigrant to come to his house in New York; the emigrant consented, was drugged with whisky, and found himself a Federal soldier. He deserted, and found himself in gaol. Here was another case:—A letter had been received by Mr. Whinham, of Hull, from his nephew, who stated that he left Liverpool in an American ship. On the voyage he was very much ill-used by the captain and crew, and he stated that immediately after he had landed he was seized by soldiers and taken by force to an island near New York, the name of which he did not give—though no doubt it was Long Island; here he met with several other Englishmen, all of whom had been impressed into the Federal service. This letter, which was dated June 23, stated that the recruits were being drilled daily, and that the writer almost hourly expected to receive orders to join the army. He complained loudly that the British Government did not interfere to prevent these scandalous outrages upon Englishmen, apparently forgetting that by going to America and on board an American ship he forfeited all reasonable claim upon the country he deserted. A case in the Irish Court of Bankruptcy a few days ago threw some light on the system of Federal recruiting in Ireland. In the case of a bankrupt named Ellis, an application was made for the assistance of the court on behalf of a poor woman named Comyns, whose son had enclosed her a cheque for £40, which he had received from the Federal Government for “emigrating” to that country. He was now a soldier in Grant’s army on his way to Richmond. Similar cases were referred to by Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, in a charge he delivered the other day in Ireland. He had also in his possession a proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant on the subject, and the numerous cases cropping up everywhere showed that they ought to be inquired into. He was aware that some manufacturers were of opinion that when their mills were reopened many of the persons who had gone to America would return to this country. He could not indulge in such a hope. In the first place many of these men would never turn up again, being under the ground, having been food for powder. Others would have succeeded in obtaining better wages than they obtained at home; while others, again, would have found new friends and connections which would disincline them for returning. He, therefore, thought it was a great mistake for the manufacturers to look with equanimity upon the large emigration in the belief that the men would return, and he was informed by good authority that in some parts of the country labour was getting so scarce and dear that when happier times should arrive, and the mills be again employed, the manufacturing interest would be seriously embarrassed. He, therefore, hoped that the manufacturers would set their mills to work if even only to a limited extent, as it would be nothing but an act of wisdom and prudence to do so. It was known that all the passages on board the vessels from this country to America were engaged for months in advance, and he learnt from the newspapers that there were 10,000 men from Switzerland waiting for passages to join the Federal army. What was the condition of emigrants when they got to America? To show what folly it was to emigrate at present he had a letter from a young man who wrote from Lawrence, Massachusetts, in which he said—

“I am very much surprised that people keep coming to this country, knowing that paper money is at such a discount and provisions so very high—clothing the same. Tell Cousin — from me, that 15s. per week in England is better than 8 dols. per week, which is as much as he would get. For board he would have to pay 4 dols. per week; that would leave 4 dols., which would be of the value of 6s. in English money. I am getting 9½ dols. per week, which is worth no more now than 16s. per week—so you see, that I am doing worse than I was in England. The war is ruining the country; flour, that used to sell for 7 dols., is now 15 dols. per barrel. Sugar is 35c. that was 12c. per lb. Coals are 14 dols. per ton, that sold for 7 dols. Wood is 11 dols. per cord that was 6 dols. Tea, that was 60c. per lb. when we were here before, is now 1 dol. 40c. per lb. Things are still advancing, and likely to do so. Prints and calicoes are selling at a monstrous price. Clothing of every description is enormous. We are trying to make the best of a bad job. Caution any one that thinks of taking on with —. He is misleading scores, telling them what good wages they get here, but not telling them what they have got to pay for everything; 30c. in England will bring more than 1 dol. here, take things altogether. Things are very uncertain here. I should not be very much surprised if all the places of business are stopped up in three months from now. My wages are not worth half as much as when we came here first."

That was not a very encouraging prospect for those persons who left this country in the hope of improving their position in the United States. Within the last few days some papers had been presented to the other House and had also been issued to the House of Commons which were well worthy of the consideration of hon. Members, and he thought that few would rise from their perusal without deep feelings of sorrow. The scene opened, as it were, upon a melodrama, only in this case, unhappily, the more jocose portions of a melodrama were wanting. The melodrama opened with two rascals—the one pretending to have the means of giving employment upon railways in America, and sending forth the other rascal—whom, he hoped, he was not uncharitable nor indecorous in styling an imp of the devil. That other man went to Ireland. There he plotted and made his bargain so well that, upon the plea of railway employment, he induced many persons—even some who were receiving good wages—to take up with him and to accompany him to America. He got 120 men to go with him in a steamer. It seemed as if one of these men was a match for him, for that man, wearing his hat in a peculiar manner over his forehead, it was not until they arrived in the middle of the Atlantic that it was discovered that he had only one eye. The man was, therefore, not fit for a soldier, although he would have been qualified as a navigator or railway labourer. The agent Feeny, however, complained that he had been deceived, thus showing that he wanted the men for soldiers and not for railway works. He need not enter into the sad history of that transaction, which hon. Members might have read in the papers. He would only briefly state that when they arrived in America these men were supplied with abundance of whisky even before landing. When they did land they were again dosed with whisky, made drunk, and got into the police cells, when, through the collusion, it was said, of the police with the recruiting agents, many of them were induced to become soldiers in the Federal army. It appeared that they did not like their position, for they applied to the British Minister and Consuls, the result of which was the correspondence which had been laid before Parliament, from which he would read one or two extracts. Consul Lousada, at Boston, on March 15, 1864, wrote:—

"The bounties both of the United States and of the several States, added to local premiums, amount to 700 dols., and even 820 dols., besides 15 dols. to 25 dols. to the bringer in of a recruit, and as the poor Irish are generally made drunk and given at the outside 25 dols., the sharks who prey on them collect the balance, and thus a cargo of 120, as in this instance, would net a very large profit to the speculators. There are some features in these transactions which involuntarily recall to my mind my experiences in Cuba. I trust, however, that the publication of what those who hire themselves as labourers may expect on this side will check the traffic."

It was also stated that the recruiting agents cleared 500 dols. by each man. It must also be stated, in order to show how plausibly these things were carried on, that this man Feeny, who took out a cargo of what might be called slaves, had been arrested in Ireland upon a charge of inducing men to enlist in the United States army, but he was released because it was thought he showed sufficient proof that his enterprise was legitimate, and that his object was simply to obtain men to work upon railways. With regard to many of the men who were thus taken out, they could not help enlisting. As soon as they arrived in America they were surrounded by enlistment brokers, were threatened with sixty days' imprisonment for being drunk and disorderly, and, by the collusion to which he had referred between the police and the recruiting agents, they finally became soldiers in the United States army. Consul Murray, in a letter to Lord Lyons dated April 7, 1864, wrote—

"There can be no doubt that there was a systematic attempt made to get these emigrants drunk for the purpose of enlistment. Policeman Berriok's evidence on this subject is most important. He states, 'While in Mr. Bradley's (liquor store) there were two or three well-dressed men, I do not know their names, but have seen them in this city, who appeared to be liberal with their money. These men were not drinking themselves, but the emigrants were. I saw a man who said he was from Augusta, who appeared to be talking with the men out on the railroad track. This man said to me he was a recruiting officer, and wanted some of my help to get some of the men. I told him the police had nothing to do with business of that kind. He insinuated to me that if the men wanted liquor to aid them in getting it. I told him no, that I did not drink myself, and would not assist in procuring any for the men.'"

Consul Murray further said—

"The evidence given by the police officers and the recruiting officers proves that there was a very good understanding between these functionaries, and that the latter were even called and admitted to the cells with the object of inducing the men to enlist."

That statement showed that persons might, without secondary or improper views, be taken out to America, and there, finding themselves in difficulties, might be compelled to enlist. There was the case of a man named Ainsworth, who left Blackburn for Canada with the praiseworthy motive of finding the means of employment for his distressed fellow townsmen. Two bodies of thirty each went out, but the enterprize appeared not to have been successful, and Ainsworth was last heard of at Portland, while it was unknown what had become of his companions. He did not desire to raise any charge against the American Government, but he only wished to warn his fellow-countrymen of the dangers they might incur. He had brought the case before the House of Commons because he believed that the circulation of these facts throughout the country might, at all events, enable some who might otherwise be deluded and inveigled, to steer clear of the dangers which lay in their path. He would now read an extract from a despatch of Lord Lyons, dated Washington, May 3, 1864, and in doing so he would state that all his information had been obtained from this side of the water, and that he had had no correspondence whatever upon the subject with any person in America. Lord Lyons, writing to Earl Russell, said—

"Washington, May 3, 1864.

"My Lord, — The number of British subjects who are serving in the United States' army and navy is very considerable; and complaints are constantly made to me of the practices by which the enlistment of many of them has been effected. I may say, indeed, that the most laborious and most painful and unsatisfactory part of the duties which have devolved upon this Legation, since the breaking out of the civil war, is connected with these complaints. No pains have been spared by Her Majesty's Consuls and myself in investigating them, and every effort has been made by us to obtain redress for those which have appeared to be well founded. In few cases, however, have our efforts produced any satisfactory results."

Lord Lyons then went on to give the following extracts from a Report by Major General Dix, the military commandant of New York, to the Secretary of War:—

"Almost every imaginable form of outrage and deception has been developed in the cases in which Mr. Clapp was agent for the payment of bounties. . . . In some cases boys have been seduced from their homes to secure their enlistment. In others men have been drugged, and enlisted while unconscious. . . . In short, there is no artifice or fraud which has not been resorted to in carrying out this system of pillage. . . . Old men and boys, and persons labouring under incurable diseases, were in numerous instances thrust into the service under this system of public plunder, alike fraudulent to the recruits and the Government. . . . The enormous sum of 400,000 dols. has been plundered by the brokers. . . . The outrages practised on recruits are too unjust to be borne, and, in some cases, too loathsome to be detailed. Boys have been seduced from their families, drugged, and then enlisted. Two were so sadly drugged that they died—one on his arrival at Rikers Island, and the other the following day."

He wished to be fair to all parties, and would fully admit that this system was discountenanced by many honourable men in the United States, and even in the ranks of the Federal army. General Dix, in writing to General Wistar, said—

"There seems to be little doubt that many—in fact, I think I am justified in saying the most—of these unfortunate men were either deceived or kidnapped, or both, in the most scandalous and inhuman manner in New York city, where they were drugged and carried off to New Hampshire and Connecticut, mustered in, and uniformed before their consciousness was fully restored. . . . Nearly all are foreigners, mostly sailors, both ignorant of, and indifferent to, the objects of the war in which they thus suddenly find themselves involved. . . . Two men were shot here this morning for desertion, and over thirty more are now awaiting trial or execution."

He would particularly call the attention of intending emigrants to the concluding sentence of the extract which he had just read. He saw that General Dix had expressed his determination to do his best to prevent the recurrence of those outrages; but when they remembered the enormous profit which accrued to the kidnappers of those poor wretches, they would at once perceive the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of putting an end to the system. The system itself was contrary to the express regulations issued by the Government to recruiting officers—

"They will not allow any man to be deceived or inveigled into the service by false representations, but will in person explain the nature of the service, the length of the term, the pay, clothing, rations, and other allowances to which a soldier is entitled by law, to every man before he signs the enlistment."

It was, however, evident that people, after being drugged, had been admitted into the army even before their return to consciousness. He did not wish to be unfair to the United States Government, but he must say that he feared that evasions were oftentimes practised, and justice impeded. Lord Lyons had asked the Government to keep seven or eight men from going into battle until their cases had been decided, but the result of his efforts was recorded in the following despatch :—

“ Washington, May 23, 1864.

“ My Lord,—Since I first became acquainted two months ago with the circumstances under which some of the Irish passengers on board the Nova Scotian had been enlisted in the United States army at Portland, I have never ceased to urge the United States Government to take measures to prevent their being brought into collision with the enemy pending the investigation of the lawfulness of their enlistment. The copies of notes to Mr. Seward, which have been inclosed in my despatches to your Lordship, will have shown your Lordship how often I have insisted upon this in writing. I have pressed it still oftener and still more urgently in verbal communications. My endeavours have, however, been of no avail. One of the men called at the Legation the day before yesterday. He had been badly wounded in the head, and sent back from the army to a hospital here. Another of the men had, he said, been wounded ; a third was reported to be killed ; three others, when he last saw them, were advancing against the enemy under a heavy musketry fire.”

From another statement elsewhere it appeared that two of these men were killed, and possibly the third might have met with the same fate. For his own part he must say that he deplored the fate of the poor wretches who met with such treatment. It appeared to him that a war of defence was a just war, and that it became the duty of men to assist in the defence of their country. But a war of aggression was undoubtedly very wicked, and when persons who had nothing to do with the dispute took part in the warfare, such conduct was in reality nothing better than murder. It was true that there was a class of filibusters and buccaneers whose conduct was frequently viewed with a certain amount of approbation by some portions of mankind. They knew what an evil effect the adventurous deeds of such highwaymen as Dick Turpin and Claude Duval had had upon the minds of large numbers of youths, and even older people ; and the same feeling of approbation would, to a certain extent, be accorded by many to those who distinguished themselves by bravery, although they might have been engaged in a quarrel in which international law and justice were alike opposed to them. He did not, however, believe that such a feeling would be entertained when hordes of people went from this country and mingled in the distressing conflict now going on in the United States ; and when their participation in that warfare was the result of treachery and deceit everybody would exclaim against it, and demand that every exertion should be made to put an end to such a system. He had no desire to say anything against either the Government or the army of the United States. He cared not what form of Government regulated the affairs of a country, so that it protected industry and international right, so that it took means fairly to administer justice and find employment for the energies of mankind, and so that it were a Government under which the people could live and enjoy a fair amount of happiness ; and, as long as that was the case, he cared not whether the Government were monarchical, constitutional, or republican. Still less did he desire to say anything against the brave army of the United States, which, as well as its opponents, had exhibited powers of endurance and fighting rarely paralleled in history. The character of the United States army for bravery would never in future be disputed, but he thought it would be but justice to the brave soldiers who composed it that the slaughter, if it could not cease, should not at all events be maintained by supplies from other countries. Their bravery entitled them to something better than being reduced to dust and being made food for gunpowder, and it was high time that we should cease to contribute to such a result, by sending forth such hosts of emigrants from this country. The widows, orphans, and mourning relatives of these brave men were entitled to some consideration. He believed that many on both sides were now praying most fervently, though from motives of prudence, the prayer might not be readily expressed, for the cessation of this conflict. It was due to them as well, that we should do all we could to prevent any fuel being supplied to this devouring flame. What was the opinion of the man in this country who, from his position, was most competent to decide upon this question, who held in his hand the various webs of negotiation within the last few years, and who, he hoped, when the proper time came, would have the discretion to exercise his power in the interests of peace ? The wishes of the Government must, of course, be to give peace to an afflicted continent, and to take away so great a stain from the human race. Meanwhile, Earl Russell had expressed the following opinion in a despatch to Lord Lyons, dated May 27, 1864 :

"Her Majesty's Government have considered, in communication with the Law Advisers of the Crown, your Lordship's despatches of the 14th of March and 10th of April, relative to the case of the Irishmen recently enlisted at Portland and Boston for service in the United States army; and I have to state to you that it appears to Her Majesty's Government to be clear from these papers, and from the reports on the same subject which have been received from Her Majesty's Consuls at those ports, that no doubt can be entertained that the enlistment of these Irishmen was the result of a fraudulent scheme, contrived and executed in disregard of the laws and neutral rights of Great Britain. Her Majesty's Government consider that the men enlisted at Portland were induced, in evident bad faith and under false pretences, to leave their own country for the purpose of obtaining employment, which was not really ready for them on their arrival in the United States; that on landing at Portland they were designedly plied with drink, and that they were then dealt with in a manner which (although it might be the legal consequence of their disordered condition) made it natural and almost inevitable that they should easily yield to the persuasions of the recruiting officers, who were on the look-out for them, and who obtained access to them while in confinement, by the aid of the police authorities."

These facts having come to his (Lord Edward Howard's) knowledge, he felt it to be only his duty to bring the Question before the House with the view of warning those who might still be seduced into these ruinous engagements. He had also communicated with the Secretary for the Colonies, thinking that he might be better able to warn the public generally through the many emigration agents against this abominable system. The right hon. Gentleman, he believed, had applied to the agents at Liverpool on the subject, but they said that they could not aid him in his object. He had, however, since seen a ticket which was delivered to emigrants, advising them to beware of persons whom they met, and giving them other suggestions which were, no doubt, very good and unobjectionable. All he objected to in the ticket was this statement,—“Remember the American dollar is equal to 4s. 2d. English money, and the cent is equal to one farthing.” Now, he had shown that the dollar was worth nothing like that sum, and he hoped that upon this point some better information would be supplied to emigrants. He had made this plain statement in the interests of humanity, and hoped that it might do some little good by keeping, if possible, some few of these poor wretches away from the war, and by so doing assist in preventing that unnecessary effusion of blood which was a disgrace to humanity. He did not wish to embarrass the Foreign Office or the Government, or to give rise to any bad feeling, but he appealed to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Layard) and the House of Commons for some expression of feeling on this subject, if it were possible. No doubt the Foreign Office would do all it could to get redress for these poor wretches, who, though they might be foolish and misguided enough to “seek the bubble reputation in the cannon's mouth,” were still, so long as they remained British subjects, entitled to the protection of the British Government, and should be looked on as the erring children of this country. He wished to use no threats towards any other nation. But the House had lately been told that our ships of five guns were now as efficient as our ships of 130 guns used to be; our resources were ample; our wealth never was greater; we were in a position to be the arbiters of the world; and at all events our voice should have the weight which had always attached to the voice of England. He trusted that the Government, conscious of the national strength, conscious of the goodness of the cause, and conscious moreover of the truth of what he had stated—for he had not stated one hundredth part of the evil—would lose no opportunity of remedying and relieving the sufferings of these poor people, and of distributing such information throughout the country as would serve for a warning to others from being in a similar manner led astray. He trusted also that they would take every means in their power, if the opportunity presented itself, by a kind and charitable mediation, of bringing to a close this disastrous internecine war, so that peace might once more resume her sway over the American continent. He begged to move an Address for

“Copy of Papers on the subject of Emigration to the United States of America, in reference to the prolongation of the war now raging in that country.”

MR. LAYARD thought his noble Friend had done good service by the able and impartial address which he had just delivered. This was a most difficult Question for the Government to deal with, and he really did not know how the undoubted grievances which existed were to be avoided more effectually than by the publication of the important statement which the noble Lord had addressed to the House. He hoped that what his noble Friend had said would go throughout the length and breadth of the land, and that those individuals who were being induced to cross the Atlantic might be placed on their guard, and warned of the dangers to which they would be exposed on arriving in America. It was impossible for the Government to deal with this question in any other way than by reiterating the warnings of his noble Friend, and by doing all that lay in their power to instruct those who went to the United States as to the dangers which awaited them there. For this purpose the caution on the cards read by his noble Friend had been addressed to emigrants. But although a great many of these persons were seduced on their arrival in the United States and were treated in the way described, being forced against their will to become soldiers of the United States, a large number of them were not exposed to this risk. They were induced to go to America upon the representations—many very just representations—that on their arrival they would receive immediate employment and much higher wages than they would receive in this country. It was therefore not wonderful that large numbers of persons, especially in Ireland, should wish to cross the water. As to the persons who had been guilty of seducing these unfortunate victims, they so carried on their business in this country that it was impossible for the Government to touch them. It was exceedingly difficult to bring home the offence to these persons, because they took care, while under the laws of this country, not to infringe them openly. The description which his noble Friend had given as to what awaited these unfortunate persons on the other side of the ocean was too true. Almost daily communications on the subject were received at the Foreign Office. He had rarely come down to the House that Session without having a letter placed in his hand, giving some heartrending accounts of the sufferings of poor creatures who had been entrapped into the ranks of the American army. It was only the other day that an hon. and gallant Friend gave him a letter which disclosed a most melancholy case. A man went to the States in search of employment, intending as soon as he obtained it to send for his wife and family. He fell in with an agent on board the ship who gained his confidence, and invited him to his house on their arrival at New York. There the poor man was made drunk, and found himself next day engaged, without his knowledge or consent, as a soldier in the Federal army. In a fit of desperation he deserted; and his wife had lately received from him the last letter probably he would ever write, announcing that he had been arrested, convicted by a court-martial, and sentenced to be shot. Now such cases as that occurred over and over again. Her Majesty's Government had done all in their power to counteract this nefarious system. Lord Lyons had been quite indefatigable in his efforts for the protection of British interests in the States. A Return was moved for in the other House of the number of cases in which representations had been made as to the lives and property of British subjects in America. It took a gentleman in the Foreign Office three months to prepare that Return, and in doing so he had to consult many thousand documents. In fact, an incredible amount of work had been undertaken by the Ministry in regard to these matters. He did not say that the American Government had not, in most cases, expressed themselves willing to do justice; but as his noble Friend stated, the references from one office to another, and he was afraid the evasions of officers in command of regiments, who were unwilling to surrender any of their men, defeated the ends of justice. Mr. Seward exhibited every desire to do justice, but it sometimes happened that when they had traced a man, he was killed or removed out of reach, before measures could be taken for his release. Every endeavour would be made to give protection to these unfortunate emigrants; but nothing would be of greater practical utility than the able speech of his noble Friend. He trusted that that speech would go throughout the country, and serve as a warning to intending emigrants of the tricks and seductions to which they would be exposed on the other side of the Atlantic. It was the duty of all persons connected in any way with emigration, as, for instance, persons residing in districts from which emigration was taking place, to circulate the warning as much as possible. His noble Friend's remark as to the change in the value of the dollar and the cent was perfectly true, and he would take care to bring the matter under the notice of the Colonial Office in order that the circular might be corrected. Having been under the impression, until he arrived in the House, that the Motion of his noble Friend would be answered by his right hon. Friend the Colonial Secretary, he was not prepared, as he otherwise would have been, to supply any further information on the subject. All the facts stated by his noble Friend were, he believed, strictly accurate, and had been brought forward, not in any spirit of hostility to the American Government, which all must deprecate, but in a way that could give offence to none. He could not but hope that the American Government would do what they could to prevent those great abuses from taking place in the seaport towns. If the Federal authorities desired, they might do a good deal in that direction, and he hoped the speech of his noble Friend would produce an impression on the other, as well as on this side of the ocean. If such a state of things existed in this country, he was sure every honourable man would desire to put a stop to it, and no Government would hesitate to punish those who attempted to infringe the laws. His noble Friend was right in saying that the laws of the United States were opposed to any proceedings. Of course nothing could be done to check emigration, but emigrants might be put on their guard as to the reception they had to expect in New York. A despatch had been received within the last few days from Lord Lyons, stating that five or six men had recently been released from the army, and that Mr. Seward had promised to institute a stringent inquiry, and to set free any others who had been improperly enlisted. He would endeavour, during the recess, to collect the information which his noble Friend desired.

Mr. FERRAND said, the working classes of this country, as well as of Ireland, must feel greatly indebted to the noble Lord for his able and important speech. He concurred in the opinion that that speech ought to be circulated throughout the country. The expense of doing so might be great, nevertheless he would ask the Government whether they had not some funds in hand—secret-service money for example—which could be usefully employed for that purpose.

Mr. HENNESSY said, he would be glad to ascertain from the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether since the debate on Irish emigration he had received information that the departure of men, evidently for the American army, was still going on. By the most recent communications from Ireland it appeared that the number of vessels and emigrants leaving Cork was as great now as at any time during the early part of last year. In his opinion, the noble Lord had performed an important public service in directing attention to this subject, and his speech contrasted favourably with that of the noble Lord at the head of the Government on the occasion referred to, who had attributed that emigration to the action of the law of level in Ireland, and declined to take any measures with the view of arresting it. They were then told that as employment and high wages were to be found in America, emigrants must go there, and the Government would not consent at that time even to the Resolution he moved, that the decline of population in Ireland was to be regretted. So far from his poor countrymen being well off in America, the papers since laid on the table disclosed a very different picture. One writer said—

“The condition of the men the morning after their arrival in Charlestown was anything but gratifying. Their number had already been diminished by those left behind at Portland, and of these the recruiting agents had snapped up eight. Without money, without friends, with scanty clothing, with no means to procure sustenance, they would have suffered greatly, had not kindhearted country-women supplied their wants. Recruiting agents hovered round them, and in the course of the day gobbled up several. On the evening of Thursday they had another interview with Mr. Kidder, when they were told the hall must be cleared, and they would not have had a place to lay their heads had not Captain John Warren, who keeps an establishment on that street, near by, bestirred himself and procured billets for them upon the neighbours round. Yesterday morning they were still in Bunker-hill-street, subsisting upon charity, and still pestered with recruiting agents.”

Again, this was the sort of food they got—

“Their supper, when they arrived in Bunker-hill-street, after fasting all day, consisted of a barrel of crackers and a cheese, with a knife on it, and the question was, ‘Who shall?’ and there was a scramble, some getting enough for five, others getting nothing. For breakfast they had buckets of whisky. That night, without beds, or even straw, enlisting agents were among them all the time.”

Such was the condition of the unfortunate Irish emigrants, who were tempted to leave their country by representations of the high bounties to be obtained in America, which were made, not merely by American agents, but by Members of Her Majesty’s Government. He trusted that the Government would, in future, look to the real facts of the case as stated in authentic papers, and not to theoretical doctrines of the law of level. He hoped, also, that they would afford to the suffering agricultural population of Ireland the same assistance, in the shape of advances for public works, which had been furnished to the manufacturing districts of Lancashire.

MR. LINDSAY said, he also hoped that the very able and excellent speech of the noble Lord would obtain wide publicity, although he hardly knew how its circulation could be undertaken by the House. These poor emigrants might not be aware of the fact, that the American dollar at the present rate of exchange was worth only about 1s. 6d. of English money; consequently, a man in this country earning four shillings was as well off as the man earning three dollars in the United States. The House was perhaps not aware of the enormous number of men drafted into the United States army. The Report of Mr. Wilson, the Chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate, showed that, between the 30th of May, 1863, and the 30th of May, 1864, no less than 700,000 men were drafted into the service of the United States, and he believed were drilled and marched into the field. Altogether, from the first outbreak of that dreadful and vain war, down to the 30th of June last, there had been drafted into the Federal service and placed upon its pay-roll no less than 2,300,000 men. He presumed that there were now close upon 1,000,000 men upon the pay-roll of the Federal Government, although there could hardly now be more than 500,000 of them in active service. But even supposing the whole million to be available, what had become of the other 1,300,000? That was a matter which the young men of Ireland and Germany who thought of emigrating to the United States would do well to ponder over. Half a million, and more, of those men were either in their graves or disabled for life. England was directly interested in preventing the recruiting which was going on in this country on behalf of the United States. We had subscribed and voted in that House about £3,000,000 for the relief of the distress in Lancashire caused by that lamentable war. Again, the cost of manufactured cotton goods to the people of this country in 1860, before the outbreak of the war, was about £25,000,000 per annum, and the value of those same goods now was close upon £60,000,000, so that the actual direct loss upon cotton goods alone to the people of this country was about £35,000,000, besides the money voted and subscribed. If the people of this country thought the war would result in the restoration of the Union or in the accomplishment of the objects of the Federal Government, perhaps they would be willing to bear these evils; but nine-tenths of them believed that it was a vain war, in which the North could never attain its end of subjugating the South. He was glad to hear the answer given that day by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. An opinion prevailed in and out of that House, that if Her Majesty's Government had used the same diligence to find out these enlistments for the Federal service as they had used to find out whether certain vessels were being built for the Confederates, these enlistments would have been stopped. But the matter was no doubt attended with difficulty; and he believed that the authorities of the Foreign Office had more than once said, "Only give us proof that a man has been enlisted in this country, only give us something to go upon, and we will act with promptitude."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he should have come to the House prepared with details which he thought would have refuted the hon. and learned Member's assertion, that emigration and enlistment were still going on in Ireland in the same degree as was the case some time ago, if he had expected that the question would have been raised again that day. That question, it would be recollected, had already been fully discussed in the House, when the views of the Government in this matter were fully stated. Since then the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had issued a proclamation on the subject, which had been circulated throughout the country; and he hoped, and indeed believed, that it had had a salutary effect in checking emigration for the purpose of enlistment. The Government could not stop the emigration, but they warned the people as much as possible against the traps and snares that were likely to beset them on their arrival on the American continent. He had listened with great attention to the interesting speech of the noble Lord, and thought it was a most admirable demonstration of humane and charitable feeling, which would certainly be productive of great good. It was only by such kindly and temperate expressions of opinion as the noble Lord had uttered that these poor people who were contemplating emigration could be induced to open their eyes and give ear to the advice which had already been given to them by the Government. He could only say that so far as the Executive in Ireland was concerned they had taken all the steps in their power to place before the people the gross fraud which was practised on them, as shown in the documents which had been quoted. The individual who had been referred to had not been lost sight of as long as he was in Ireland. In fact, one of the detectives in the Irish force had slept in the same bed with him, and he could assure the House that the most vigilant attention of the authorities was directed to the whole movement. The measures ordered by the Lord Lieutenant would, he felt confident, tend to diminish very materially the evil which had hitherto been so justly complained of.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he thought it unfortunate that the noble Lord's excellent speech should have been supported by the hon. Member for Sunderland. The noble Lord's Motion was couched in the calm and impartial spirit which was most likely to produce an effect in that House. He advocated the rights of his countrymen without regard to political parties in America, and in this impartiality lay the strength of the argument of the noble Lord. But the name of the hon. Member for Sunderland was most unmistakably connected with the idea of his being a warm partisan of the Southern Confederacy. He, however, disagreed with one or two of the points in the noble Lord's speech. The noble Lord spoke of the hardships which emigrants experienced on landing in America, owing to the enormous price they had to pay for provisions—twice as much as before; but his Lordship seemed hardly to bear in mind that this was the effect of the change of the value of money. Another point in which he disagreed with the noble Lord was this: he said that what this country was desirous of was simply peace. He (Mr. Taylor) denied this. Large masses in this country desired peace, but they desired peace that should be honourable to the United States of North America, and that such peace should not come till the hideous curse of slavery that had blighted America and was the real cause of the war should be swept away. He was aware that these sentiments were not popular with the upper ten thousand or the upper twenty thousand of this country; but he believed that out of 200 public meetings on the subject, only six or eight had been decided adversely to the Northern States. When the interference of British subjects in the American struggle was so much deprecated, it should not be forgotten that our countrymen were pursuing an exactly similar course in China and in Japan. Some people even thought we were censurable for not interfering in the quarrel between Denmark and Germany. The noble Lord said that, although he desired that the Government should hold out no threats against the United States, still England was in a condition to use such threats. However that might be, he thought it a most injudicious supplement to the speech of the noble Lord, that after saying the Government should not interfere against the United States, he should add that the country was in a position to do so. The sympathy of the hon. Member for Sunderland crept out in every word he uttered about America. What but intense sympathy for the South, and a strong desire for the defeat of the North, should induce him to repeat so astounding an assertion as that 2,300,000 men had been drafted into the army of the United States, of which 1,300,000 had been killed or wounded. He must have obtained his statistics from Mr. Spence's treatise, and his principles from the letters of "Manhattan." He (Mr. Taylor) thought this was simply a question of the determined will of the North to put down the rebellion, and with it slavery, and he believed the North would succeed. The hon. Member for Sunderland thought there should be mediation. Mediation meant favouring one party in the struggle. But the North would neither desire mediation nor submit to it. Mediation, therefore, meant giving a moral support to the South. It would be intervention with a vengeance, since no one who had read the recent despatches could fail to perceive that the reign of the South was rapidly approaching its close. Why, there was hardly a State in the South that was not more or less occupied by Federal troops. Their capital, if not taken, was closely beleaguered. It was Richmond, not Washington, that was in danger. He trusted that the speech of the noble Lord would have its effect in warning those who emigrated of the danger they would run of being seduced into a war in which they had no interest on either side. But when the practice of the Americans with regard to enlistment was so much reprobated, he could not help reminding the House of the old English pressgang and the enlistment shilling placed in the hands of a drunken man.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the speech of the hon. Member for Leicester appeared to have been directed, not against the very temperate and practical speech of the hon. Member for Sunderland, but against such a speech as the hon. Member (Mr. Taylor) might have supposed his hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay) intended to make, had he brought on his Motion about mediation. The noble Lord thought that the hon. Gentleman with his appeal in favour of the North was the last man to bring accusations against his hon. Friend for entertaining views in favour of the independence of the South. He wished to thank the noble Lord for his excellent speech, and he concurred in the desire which had been expressed, that means could be devised for its circulation, as a warning in the places where such warning was most required. It seemed from the speech of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that it was not only by the enlisted party that such a warning was required, but that the bond fide emigrant needed quite as much a warning as to the traps awaiting him on his arrival in the land of his adoption. He trusted, then, that the Emigration Commissioners, in their next circular of advice to emigrants, of whatever character, would warn them of the peril which in one direction awaited them, and that till the war was at an end it was not well for our fellow subjects to select America as their future home. The hon. Member for Leicester said the great masses of the people of this country were in favour of the war being prosecuted by the North. The hon. Member, though not a Leicestershire man, represented the chief town of his (Lord John Manners's) native county. Did the hon. Member, when he made his statement, carry in his mind a great meeting that took place not long since at Leicester? He (Lord John Manners) did not believe that the statement of the hon. Gentleman represented fairly the feelings of the great mass of that thriving and important manufacturing town. He did not believe in the existence of that feeling; but were that feeling existent or not, there was no man in the House who would not concur in the recommendations of the noble Lord that the Emigration Commissioners would do well to issue a warning to emigrants, whether their intentions were military or otherwise, of what was likely to occur on landing at New York. The noble Lord believed that none would regret, not even the hon. Member for Leicester, if the result should be largely to diminish those armies which were now devastating the American States.

LORD EDWARD HOWARD, in reply, said, that if he were to consult his own feelings only, he could not but be deeply gratified by the kind approval of his speech that had been expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House, but he could not avoid knowing that that approval was due to the goodness of his cause and the aptness of the materials he had employed. He hoped that some means would be found of putting the public upon their guard against unconsciously venturing upon a step which might involve them in disaster and ruin. While thanking the hon. Member for Leicester for his approval of part of his speech, he must say that he thought the hon. Member had mistaken the purport of those remarks of his which he supposed to militate against his impartiality. Had he desired to embitter the discussion, he could have mentioned a case in which the great power of this country had been used and with immediate effect. He referred to the case of the Trent. He had, however, rather appealed to the propriety of international law and to the justice of international feeling, with a view that the present state of things might cease. The hon. Member for Leicester seemed to think that he had overstated the enhancement of prices in America, but he had quoted the letter of one who was on the spot, and there could be no doubt that since that letter was written prices had still further advanced proportionately with the increase in the price of gold. He thanked the Under Secretary of State for his offer to grant all the information in his power to give, and he trusted that some means of making public that information would be found. It was, after all, by the usual means of public information that the greatest amount of good might be done in this matter, as, if the information was published, not only in the London newspapers, but also in the local and Irish newspapers, it would be brought effectually within the reach of all classes. He should be grateful to think he had a share in any good result which this discussion might produce.

Motion agreed to.

Address for "Copy of Papers on the subject of Emigration to the United States of America, in reference to the prolongation of the war now raging in that country."

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock.

COMMISSIONERS.

The PARLIAMENT was this day prorogued by Commission.

The LORDS COMMISSIONERS — namely, The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Westbury); The LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Earl of St. Germans); The EARL DE GREY and RUPON (One of the Principal Secretaries of State); The LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Viscount Sydney) and The LORD WENSLEYDALE—being in their robes, and seated on a Form placed between the Throne and the Wool-sack; and the COMMONS being come with their Speaker, the ROYAL ASSENT was given to several Bills.

Then THE LORD CHANCELLOR delivered the SPEECH of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS as follows:—

“ My Lords, and Gentlemen,

“ WE are commanded by Her Majesty to release you from further Attendance in Parliament, and at the same Time to convey to you Her Majesty’s Acknowledgments for the Zeal and Assiduity with which you have applied yourselves to the Discharge of your Duties during the Session of Parliament now brought to a Close.

“ HER Majesty commands us to inform you that She greatly regrets that the Endeavours which She made, in concert with The Emperor of the French, The Emperor of Russia, and The King of Sweden, to bring about a Reconciliation between the German Powers and The King of Denmark, were not successful, and that the Hostilities which had been suspended (during the Negotiations) were again resumed. Her Majesty trusts, however, that the Negotiations which have been opened between the Belligerents may restore Peace to the North of Europe.

"HER Majesty, having addressed Herself to the Powers who were contracting Parties to the Treaty by which the Ionian Republic was placed under the Protectorate of Great Britain, and having obtained their Consent to the Annexation of that Republic to the Kingdom of Greece, and the States of the Ionian Republic having agreed thereto, the Republic of the Seven Islands has been formally united to the Kingdom of Greece, and Her Majesty trusts that the Union so made will conduce to the Welfare and Prosperity of all the Subjects of His Majesty The King of the Hellenes.

"HER Majesty's Relations with The Emperor of China continue to be friendly, and the Commerce of Her Subjects with the Chinese Empire is increasing.

"HER Majesty has been engaged, in concert with The Emperor of Austria, The Emperor of the French, The King of Prussia, and The Emperor of Russia, in an Endeavour to bring to Effect an amicable Arrangement of Differences which had arisen between the Hospodar of Moldo-Wallachia and his Suzerain The Sultan. Her Majesty has the Satisfaction to inform you that this Endeavour has been successful.

"HER Majesty deeply laments that the Civil War in North America has not been brought to a Close. Her Majesty will continue to observe a strict Neutrality between the Belligerents, and would rejoice at a friendly Reconciliation between the Contending Parties.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"HER Majesty commands us to convey to you Her warm Acknowledgments for the liberal Supplies which you have granted for the Service of the present Year, and towards the permanent Defence of Her Majesty's Dockyards and Arsenals.

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"HER Majesty has observed with Satisfaction that the Distress which the Civil War in North America has created in some of the Manufacturing Districts has to a great Extent abated, and Her Majesty trusts that increased Supplies of the raw Material of Industry may be expected from Countries by which it has hitherto been scantily furnished.

"THE Revolt of certain Tribes in New Zealand has not yet been quelled, but it is satisfactory to Her Majesty to know that a large Portion of the Native Population of those Islands have taken no Part in this Revolt.

"It has been a Source of much Gratification to Her Majesty to observe the rapid Development of the Revenues of Her East Indian Possessions, and the general Contentment of the People inhabiting those extensive Regions.

"HER Majesty has given Her cordial Assent to many Measures of public Usefulness, the Result of your Labours during the Session now brought to a Close.

"THE Act for extending to Women and Children employed in various Trades the Regulations applicable to Factories in general, will tend materially to preserve the Health and improve the Education of those on whose Behalf it was framed.

"THE Act for authorizing the Grant of Government Annuities will encourage Habits of Prudence among the Working Classes, and will afford them the Means of securely investing the Results of their Industry.

"THE Act for authorizing a further Advance for Public Works in some of the Manufacturing Districts will contribute to alleviate the Distress in these Districts, and will afford the Means of completing many Works of much Importance for the Health of the Population.

"THE Act for giving increased Facilities for the Construction of Railways will diminish the Expenses attendant upon the Extension of those important Channels of Communication.

"It has afforded to Her Majesty the most heartfelt Satisfaction to observe the general Well-being and Contentment which prevail throughout Her Dominions, and to remark the progressive Increase and Development of the National Resources, and to find that, after sufficiently providing for the Public Service, you have been able to make a material Diminution in the Taxation of the Country.

"On returning to your respective Counties you will still have important Duties to perform, essentially connected with the linking together of the several Classes of the Community; and Her Majesty fervently prays that the Blessing of Almighty God may attend your Exertions, and guide them to the Object of Her Majesty's constant Solicitude, the Welfare and Happiness of Her People."

Then a Commission for proroguing the Parliament was read.

After which

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said—

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, under the Great Seal, to us and other Lords directed, and now read, we do, in Her Majesty's Name, and in obedience to Her Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Thursday the Thirteenth Day of October next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Thursday the Thirteenth Day of October next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

DENMARK AND GERMANY. SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.—QUESTION.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether (France and England having placed on record that in their opinion no satisfactory settlement of the Schleswig-Holstein Question can be arrived at otherwise than with the consent of the populations of those countries, either through their constitutional organs or in some other way, and Prussia having made proposals during the Conference which implied that she shared that opinion) Her Majesty's Government have, in conjunction with that of His Majesty the Emperor of the French, taken steps to urge on the Government of Prussia the propriety of not departing from that principle, and the importance, in the interests of European peace, of acting upon it as speedily as possible?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: No, Sir; as long as the British Government were acting in Conference in conjunction with the other Neutral Powers, of course proposals and suggestions were made; but the Conference being over, negotiations have terminated; and the negotiations being now conducted between the belligerent parties, it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to interfere further in the matter.

PRINCE COUZA AND THE PORTE.

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that Prince Couza has issued a Proclamation dated 2nd (14th) July to the Roumanian people, wherein it is stated that—

"His Majesty the Sultan, our Illustrious Sovereign, and the Guaranteeing Powers, have recognized the New Institutions of Roumania created by the Plebiscite of the 10th (22nd) to the 14th (26th) May?"

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, Prince Couza, of his own authority, issued edicts entirely altering the constitution of the Principalities. The Porte objected to that, and so did the Powers who at the Treaty of Paris had to a certain degree undertaken to secure to the Principalities certain constitutional institutions. The Prince was summoned to Constantinople, where he communicated with the Porte and with the Representatives of the Powers who were parties to the Treaty of Paris, and the result of the deliberations of these parties was an agreement between the Porte and Prince Couza as to certain modifications in the constitution which had been given, certain portions of that constitution being maintained and other portions being altered. The result was considered satisfactory, both by the Porte and by the other European Powers.

THE VOLUNTEER SERVICE.

QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether the 20th section of the Volunteer Act of 1863 will apply to the case of a private (William Lodge, 146, Cannon Street Road, St. George's-in-the-East) of the Third London Rifle Volunteer Regiment, who was disabled while under official inspection, and therefore in actual Military Service—namely, on the 16th of May, 1864, at West End Park, Kilburn? the section referred to being as follows:—

"A Volunteer, or Non-Commissioned Officer of the Volunteer Permanent Staff, disabled on actual Military Service, shall, according to his rank, be entitled to the like pension and other benefits, if any, as a Soldier of Her Majesty's Army."

MR. HUTT said, in the absence of his noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington), he would endeavour to answer the Question of the hon. Member. He regretted to say that the Volunteer who was the subject of the unfortunate accident was not, under the provisions of the Volunteer Act of 1863, entitled to a pension. He was not, within the meaning of that Act, engaged on actual military service. Such actual military service would only occur to a Volunteer in the event of an invasion of the country, or the immediate apprehension of such an event.

CASE OF FLOGGING AT SUNDERLAND.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Buxton), he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of John Croudace and Thomas Allison, who were flogged on Saturday last in the County Prison at Sunderland; and what the names were of the magistrates by whom the same was ordered and superintended?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that his attention had been called to this case by a Question which had been put to him the other evening. He assumed then that this punishment had been inflicted by virtue of a sentence passed in conformity with the provisions of an Act passed last Session, which, for the first time, authorized corporal punishment to be inflicted in certain cases, in addition to penal servitude. Since then he had seen the calendar and the list of the convictions, and he found that these two prisoners were convicted of robbery with violence, and were sentenced by Mr. Baron Pigott to terms of penal servitude, and to receive twenty lashes with the cat within one week of the date of their conviction. He had no doubt that the sentence was carried into effect in strict conformity with the Act of last Session. Very few sentences had been passed under the provisions of that Act, but this was one of them. The magistrates were in no way responsible for the sentence; the only persons bound to be present at the infliction of the punishment being the governor of the gaol and the surgeon.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to know whether the cat was made of leather, and not of whipcord?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he did not know the difference, or whether the cat of leather or of whipcord was the heavier instrument. The Judge who passed the sentence directed that the punishment should be inflicted with a cat instead of a birch-rod, according to the provisions of the statute.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether a Royal Commission is about to be issued to inquire into all those Endowed Schools which were not inquired into by the last two Education Commissions?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, an application was recently made to his noble Friend at the head of the Government for issuing a Commission with a view of inquiry into the state of those schools in which the children of the middle classes were principally educated, which were not included within the scope of the Commission for inquiry into the higher-class schools, nor within that of the Commission to inquire into the state of the ordinary schools for the lower class, which were supported by Parliamentary Grants. The Government thought it would be very useful that such an inquiry should take place, and a Commission would shortly be issued.

INDIA—FINANCE ACCOUNTS.

QUESTION.

MR. TORRENS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he proposes to direct the attention of the Government of India to the necessity of closing the Finance and Revenue Accounts on a much earlier date than at present, in order that the Indian Financial Statement may be made soon after the meeting of Parliament; whether he has any objection to have the Finance and

Sir George Grey

Revenue Accounts to be submitted to the House of Commons so arranged as to exhibit the Military and Naval (if any) Charges and Estimates for the maintenance of our Forces, European and Native, separately in the Presidency of Bengal, the North Western Provinces, the Oude Territory, the Punjaub Territories, the Presidency of Bombay, the Province of Sind, the Nagpore Territory, the Districts of East and West Berar, the Presidency of Madras with Coorg, the Eastern Settlements, and the Pegu and Tenasserim Provinces; and whether he has any objection to insert in the future annual Finance Accounts the total number of British troops, of Native troops, and of Military police, for whom the charges entered in the Accounts have been incurred?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in reply, that the investigation of the Indian Finance Accounts was submitted to the charge of two gentlemen, upon whom devolved the duty of arranging them; and in the majority of cases it was found impossible to submit the financial statement to that House at an earlier period of the Session. He apprehended that the best course he could pursue would be to communicate with Sir Charles Trevelyan, with a view to ascertain what could be done in order to get the accounts at an earlier period than at present. In reply to the second Question of the hon. Gentleman, he thought it would be of no advantage, but that it would be, on the other hand, an evil to attempt to distribute the accounts of each Presidency—as that for instance of Bengal—within its own limits—inasmuch as the accounts of each district would furnish no guide to the general revenue and expenditure of the country. In answer to the third Question, he had only to say he should have not the least objection to state at any time the number of troops for whom the charges in the accounts had been incurred.

MR. TORRENS said, he wished to explain that his inquiry merely extended to the expenses, and not to the number of the troops employed.

IRELAND—INAUGURATION OF THE O'CONNELL STATUE.

QUESTION.

MAJOR STUART KNOX said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government a Question of which he had given him private notice, it was

Whether the noble Lord is aware that a great party demonstration is to take place in Dublin on the occasion of the inauguration of the O'Connell Statue; and whether the Government will allow the provisions of the Processions and Party Emblems Acts to be set at nought on that occasion, as was the case at the funeral of Mr. M'Manus?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Really, Sir, I have no information on the subject. I take it for granted that whenever the event to which the hon. and gallant Member has referred may be expected to take place, the Government will take all the measures which it will be their duty to take in order to preserve public order.

THE MOUNT ST. BERNARD REFORMATORY.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, in consequence of his unavoidable absence, he was unable to submit to the House the Motion which stood in his name in reference to the Correspondence on the subject of the Reformatory of Mount St. Bernard. He begged now to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department as he can not allude to that correspondence, whether the certificate of the Inspector as regarded the Reformatory has not been practically withdrawn?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied that the papers for which the hon. Gentleman gave notice of his intention to move did not relate, as he (Sir George Grey) understood, to recent circumstances, but only to the alleged mismanagement and disorder which prevailed at the Reformatory in 1863. A great deal of correspondence had taken place on the subject, but as the management of the institution had since passed into other hands, it was not considered expedient to produce it. He had certainly determined upon withdrawing the certificate; but subsequently he allowed it to remain in consequence of a representation having been made by the Inspector (Mr. Sidney Turner), that much inconvenience would arise if it were withdrawn. The certificate was then allowed to stand subject to the condition that the management of the Reformatory would be taken out of the hands of the monks and placed in other hands, which was agreed to.

SCOTCH AND IRISH MARRIAGE LAW. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL said, he rose to ask, Whether the Government intend to introduce any measure early next Session to alter the Law of Marriage in Scotland, so as to make it in accordance with that of civilized nations?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON was understood to say that the Question was a large one, and that he could not undertake to promise off-hand that the law on the subject would be considered by the Government.

MR. HENNESSY said, he should like to know what Her Majesty's Government intend to do in regard to the Marriage Law in Ireland. At that moment there was the verdict of an Irish jury which had been upheld by the decision of the full Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, declaring Miss Longworth to be the lawful wife of Major Yelverton; and now they had further the decision of the final Court of Appeal that, according to the law of Scotland, she is not the wife of that gentleman.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the question in the case alluded to was one of fact, not of law. Surely the hon. Gentleman could not mean to say that a marriage performed by a Roman Catholic Priest between a Protestant and Roman Catholic was legal?

MR. HENNESSY: The jury found it to be legal.

SIR GEORGE GREY: The jury only determined a question of fact.

DENMARK AND GERMANY — THE ARMISTICE.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government, Whether any information has reached him in regard to the nine months' armistice agreed upon between the Danish and the German Powers? As this armistice has been agreed to before the arrival of the Danish Representative at the Conference, it must have been effected through foreign mediation. He wished to know, Whether the noble Lord is aware of any such foreign mediation?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON, in reply, said, he believed that no such mediation had been employed. He believed that the French Government had recommended moderation to the German Powers, but the negotiations had been carried on entirely between the Representative of Denmark on the one side, and those of Austria and Prussia on the other.

PRISON MINISTERS ACT.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. HENNESSY, pursuant to notice, rose to call attention to the proceedings of the Middlesex magistrates with reference to the Prison Ministers Act; and to move an address for papers. The hon. Gentleman said, a few days ago, he had presented a petition, signed by upwards of 10,000 Roman Catholics residing in the county of Middlesex, complaining that the provisions of the Prison Ministers Act had not been carried into effect by the Middlesex magistrates. It appeared that during the year ending Michaelmas, 1863, no less than forty-six Roman Catholics were received into the three prisons of Middlesex, and that at one time, in February last, those three prisons contained Roman Catholic prisoners. The petitioners stated that, owing to the conduct of the Middlesex magistrates, those unfortunate prisoners were deprived of that spiritual consolation and religious instruction which by the Prison Ministers Act the Legislature intended to give them. The Middlesex magistrates not only refused to appoint a Roman Catholic priest to attend upon those prisoners, but they had subsequently taken a particular step which indicated that they had been animated by motives which he did not think that House would approve. After refusing to carry out the provisions of the Prison Ministers Act, they proceeded a few days afterwards to pass the following resolution—

"That a Scripture Reader be appointed, at a salary of £80 per annum, whose duty shall be—first, to see every prisoner about to be discharged a sufficient length of time beforehand to enable him to make himself acquainted, as far as may be, with his position and character, with a view to ascertaining whether he is a fit object for relief by the Visiting Justices, through the agency of the Discharged Prisoners Aid Committee; secondly, to devote whatever time remains at his disposal to the religious instruction of the prisoners generally, in the two new buildings of the prison, and that in this part of his duties he be placed under the supervision and control of the prison chaplain."

It was obvious that the appointment of such a person, under such circumstances, was but an indirect attempt to proselytise the Roman Catholic prisoners. Hon. Members knew that the Scripture readers were generally of a controversial turn of mind, and the Scripture reader in question would have a clear field for the exercise of his powers when armed with the power of reporting upon the prisoners who were most deserving of relief from the Prisoners Aid Fund. He (Mr. Hennessy) wished to ask the Home Secretary, whether Her Majesty's Government approved of those proceedings, and whether they were aware of all the circumstances connected with them. It appeared, further, that the Chairman of the Middlesex magistrates was Mr. Pownall, who (he perceived from an advertisement in The Times) was an active member of the Committee of the Protestant Alliance. He thought it very unfortunate that a gentleman who was acting in such a semi-judicial capacity should be also closely connected with that body, which boasted, in the very advertisement to which he had referred, of the opposition it had given from time to time to the proceedings of the House of Commons. He considered that the conduct pursued by the Middlesex magistrates was highly unjust to the Roman Catholic prisoners themselves, unjust to millions of the Queen's subjects of the Roman Catholic Faith, and unjust also to the great mass of the people of this country, who believed that religious freedom and equal laws for all existed throughout the kingdom.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of any Papers concerning the Proceedings of the Middlesex Magistrates, with reference to the Prison Ministers Act."—(Mr. Hennessy.)

MR. NEWDEGATE, having had the honour of presenting a petition from the Middlesex magistrates, might state that he was present at the discussion which resulted in the passing of the resolution alluded to by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the King's County. He thought it right to call the attention of the House to a former resolution of the Middlesex magistrates, the last words of which were—

"And no prisoner belonging to any church or religious persuasion shall be compelled to attend any religious service, held or performed by any chaplain, minister, or religious instructor of a church or religious persuasion to which the said prisoner does not belong."

He could assure the House that the terms of that resolution had been strictly observed by the Middlesex magistrates. He had heard Mr. Serjeant Bellasis propose that the Roman Catholic prisoners should be placed under the exclusive supervision of the Roman Catholic priests. In consequence of that declaration the Middlesex magistrates, acting in conformity with the spirit of the Act, refused to make any appointment which would entail such compulsory supervision. He had voted for that resolution of the Middlesex magistrates, and that was the ground upon which he did so. In reference to what the hon. Gentleman had said, respecting Mr. Pownall having appointed a Scripture reader for the performance of certain duties in the prisons, he could only state that Mr. Pownall was incapable of adopting any such means for the purpose of proselytism. But having a person as Scripture reader whom they could trust, that person was employed to make the inquiries with reference to the distribution of the Prisoners Aid Fund. It was his conviction that the Middlesex magistrates would continue to act to the best of their ability in the spirit of the Prison Ministers Act. When the hon. and learned Member for the King's County expressed uneasiness at the idea of proselytism by means of the Scripture reader, he could assure him that he was doing a great injustice to a body of gentlemen, of which he (Mr. Newdegate) had the honour of being a member, and especially to Mr. Pownall, their honoured and trustworthy chairman.

SIR GEORGE GREY, in answer to the hon. and learned Member for the King's County, begged to say that the papers recently laid upon the table contained the correspondence asked for. He had done all that he felt he could do, in pointing out to the visiting justices of Middlesex the power which the law placed in their hands in this matter, and in urging upon them their responsibility in the exercise of that power. The Prison Ministers Act did three things. It gave power in England to the magistrates in quarter sessions to appoint a Roman Catholic priest to visit the Roman Catholic prisoners, where there was a certain number of prisoners of that persuasion, and it also empowered them to award such remuneration as they deemed just to the Roman Catholic priest who performed those services. In a subsequent part of the Act, the visiting justices, as distinguished from the Court of Quarter Session, were expressly authorized to dispense with the necessity of exacting a request from the Roman Catholic prisoner as a condition to his seeing a priest, and were likewise enabled to permit a priest, if they saw fit, to visit the prisoners of his own church, subject to certain arrangements, for the prevention of improper intercourse. In the early part of the year the visiting justices had had that question brought before them, and they had declined to exercise the power which the law gave them. He could make no complaint against them for exercising that discretion, but he thought the magistrates in quarter sessions went beyond the power and the spirit of the act in passing the resolution that had been referred to. He pointed out to the visiting magistrates that the law vested the appointment in them, and that they were not bound by the resolution of the Court of Quarter Sessions. The visiting justices of Cold-bath Fields Prison had before intimated to him their views in almost the same terms he addressed to the quarter sessions, and that they were willing to exercise their power, but that in deference to the resolution of the Court of Quarter Sessions, they thought they had better not do so. In the case of the other two prisons they said they did not consider themselves actually precluded from the resolution from doing so, but that in consequence of that resolution, they thought they ought not to make the appointment. He regretted they had taken that view of the duty imposed on them by Parliament, because he thought it was contrary to the intention of the Act, and the Court of Quarter Sessions ought not to have endeavoured to control the visiting justices. He had no power to make them take a different view of their duty. He had, however, stated his own opinion upon the subject, and he had some hopes that it would be reconsidered. The hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire had represented Mr. Serjeant Bellasis' letter as a proposition to place the Roman Catholic prisoners under the absolute supervision of the Roman Catholic priests; but the fact was that he simply called upon the visiting justices to carry out strictly the provisions of the Act. He regretted very much that occasion had been given by the magistrates in quarter session to our fellow Roman Catholic subjects to complain in this matter of injustice done to them. Parliament had enacted that it was expedient that Roman Catholic prisoners should receive religious instruction from ministers of that religion. Though the number of Roman Catholic prisoners confined in these prisons was very large, it should be borne in mind that 115 only, out of 391 Roman Catholic prisoners in one prison, and in another not one out of 97, had requested the attendance of a priest in the quarter ending January, 1864. The number of Roman Catholics in these prisons was very great, and he, therefore, felt it to be unfortunate that the magistrates in quarter sessions had not shown a greater disposition to carry into effect the intention of the Legislature in this matter.

MR. NEWDEGATE, in explanation, read the resolution agreed to by the Middlesex Sessions—

"That it appears to this Court that, by the laws now in force, all prisoners who belong to churches or persuasions differing from the Church of England, in addition to the instruction they may be willing to receive from the chaplain of the prison, are entitled, at their own request, to be visited by a minister of the religious persuasion to which they belong; but no prisoners are compellable to receive such visits against their will; that comparatively few prisoners of the various religious denominations have made such requests, and those who have have been duly visited; this Court is, therefore, of opinion that the present arrangements for the moral and religious instruction of the prisoners are sufficient, and that any appointments by this Court, or permission by the visiting justices, for Roman Catholic priests to attend at the prisons on all occasions, whether their ministrations are required or not, would be unnecessary and improper."

MR. WYLD desired to defend Mr. Pownall from the imputation of any religious bias in this matter. That gentleman had for a number of years discharged the duties of his office with honour to himself and to the satisfaction of the public.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO—PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. KINGLAKE, in rising to submit the Motion of which he had given notice relative to Mexico, observed that the papers for which he should move were necessary, in justification of the very important decision which had been come to by Government. He thought this country could not sufficiently congratulate itself on the fact that, thanks to the spirit and sagacity of Sir Charles Wyke, it was happily disentangled from the invasion the French were carrying on in Mexico. He was glad to find that the information of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the extent of that invasion was even more favourable to the views which he entertained on this question, than was the information which had come to himself. They now knew the extent of territory into which that invasion had penetrated. The Archduke's Government, it was stated, was occupying Tampico; but, in order to free that statement from deception, it must be also stated that there was no land communication between Mexico and Tampico, and the latter had only been occupied because the French had a naval communication with that port, and the result was that the French invasion occupied a wedge-like piece of territory only one-tenth of the extent of Mexico, hemmed in by 39,000 regular troops, and by an amount of guerrilla troops which it was not easily to compute. It was quite clear, therefore, that there was no justification, in point of fact, for the proposed recognition of the Archduke's Government; but it must rest upon policy. It was quite possible there might be a policy to justify us in recognizing a ruler notwithstanding that he had not succeeded in possessing himself of the country. The way in which matters stood was this. If, in point of fact, the ruler was in possession of the country, there could be nothing offensive in acknowledging a fact so established; but if the fact did not correspond with the claims—if he who professed to be Emperor of all Mexico occupied only a small portion of it, the acknowledgment of his pretensions was an expression of preference—an intimation that he would be warranted in proceeding by fire and sword to subjugate an independent people. That seemed a very strong proposition to maintain. No doubt wherever the French army had penetrated it would be easy to find persons called "Notables" to offer a crown to an Archduke, but he believed he was warranted in saying that beyond the reach of the French armies no one had expressed the slightest inclination for the introduction of the monarchical system into that part of the world. He held in his hand the copy of a very interesting letter from General Prim to the Emperor Napoleon, which he would have read to the House, but from the very uncertain term of the present sitting. General Prim stated in that letter that the experiment of a Mexican Monarchy had been tried, and persons had been made to understand that they should express their opinions. That state of things had continued for two months, but notwithstanding every intrigue and every opportunity given to encourage the expression of opinion in favour of the monarchical system, nothing of the kind had occurred. The General, therefore, coun-sedled the Emperor to withdraw from the experiment, which was altogether inapplicable to the state of the country. How did it, then, consist with the principle which this country had always held, to be siding with the invader against the invaded? He had always thought that one of the great objects which England aimed at was the independence of nations, and yet we were here showing a preference for invaders, who came without a Mexican in their camp, except some priests who had made themselves hateful to their country, and who would not venture to remain there but for the support of the French. True, General Marquez was amongst the exiled faction, but he was a man whom he would not say had robbed, but had removed by force the sum of £132,000 from the British Legation. That man was now the foremost soldier in the service of the Archduke Maximilian, and had received the decoration of the Legion of Honour. That was the man who was engaged with the Archduke Maximilian in his attempt to subdue the country; an attempt to which we had given our sanction, he was going to say recognition, but it could hardly be termed recognition, because we had not yet recognized the Archduke as Sovereign of that country, though for some reason hitherto unexplained it seemed that we had entered into an engagement to do so at some future period. There might, possibly, be some reason for such a course which the papers for which he asked would disclose, but he could not but regard the course which we had pursued as one which differed from the ordinary practice of English statesmen. Over and over again English statesmen had been asked to say what they would do in the case of some future contingency, and their answer had always been that it did not become them to say, because the Government of this country was a Parliamentary Government, and their duty, therefore, was to avoid as much as possible doing anything which would tend to fetter the hands of their successors. But Her Majesty's Government seemed to have departed from that wholesome principle, and to have promised the French Government that they would recognize this invasion. As far as he was able to gather from the official papers of the French themselves, he believed that the invasion of the French by fire and sword was not only directed against the people of the country who were in arms, but also against peaceful villagers. A colonel in the French army had threatened a village with destruction, not because the inhabitants had resisted the French, but because they had fled to the mountains on their approach, and their only alternative was to furnish supplies to the enemies of their country. That was the kind of cause with which we were associated. If the invasion were in itself politic and just, then he freely admitted that the fact of the recognition being gratifying to a neighbouring potentate would only be an extra inducement for us to adopt that course; and if the Archduke were really in the occupation of these territories, he would recommend our following the policy of Mr. Canning, or even going still further, and saying that notwithstanding the invasion might be an iniquitous one, we were content, since the Archduke had succeeded in making himself Emperor, to acknowledge himself as such. That argument however could not apply when the Archduke Maximilian was only in possession of one-tenth of those vast territories. Under these circumstances, he trusted that the papers would be produced, so that they might have the means of examining fully into the grounds upon which the Government had proceeded in holding out a promise of support to the Archduke's Government.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of any Papers relating to the state of our relations with Mexico."—(Mr. Kinglake.)

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the course which Her Majesty's Government intend to pursue in this case does not differ in principle from the course which the Government has invariably pursued in similar cases. It has been our practice to acknowledge established Governments. Without going into minute questions as to the origin of the Government—whether it be a republic or a monarchy—when we find a Government established we enter into friendly relations with that Government. My hon. Friend says that we have promised prematurely to acknowledge the Emperor of Mexico before that empire has practically and really been established. I do not think our engagements have gone to that extent. Before the Archduke left Europe we were asked to acknowledge him as the future Emperor of Mexico.

We were not inclined to do that, and we said it would be entirely at variance with our practice and our principles; but that if on his arrival in Mexico he should be well received by the people and his Government regularly established, our wish was that Mexico should have a stable Government. The great cause of the dissatisfaction which we have had for a long time in respect to that country is that Mexico has been governed successively by a number of military chiefs, who one after another obtained power, and one after another availed themselves of that power to plunder and murder English subjects, for they treated them no better than the people of any other country, but rather worse. It was, therefore, a great object with us to see established in Mexico a Government with which friendly relations could be maintained; and from which we might expect justice for British subjects resident in or engaged in commerce with Mexico. My hon. Friend says that as far as his information goes the portion of Mexico occupied by French troops is very limited. That may be so; but it does not follow that in other parts of the country not occupied by French troops the people may not be inclined to support the Government of the Emperor. And we have information—we may be misled, but our information is to the effect that the Indian population, who form a large portion of the total number of the people, are very well disposed to the establishment of an empire. It is said that they have historical traditions which dispose them to this course, as they have no particular regard or fancy for the mixed Spanish race, by whom they have never been over-well treated. For these reasons it is thought that they would be glad to see the Government of the Emperor established in Mexico, and that they would willingly submit to the rule of that Government. No doubt, there is still a number of troops commanded by Native leaders in opposition to the French army, but we are told that the French Government are employing transports to bring back a number of their soldiers, which fact implies that the disposition on the part of the people of Mexico to acquiesce in the rule of the Emperor is considerably greater than my hon. Friend has been informed it is. All I can say is that our course will depend on what we hear as to the manner in which the authority of the Emperor is established. If we find there is a prospect of a permanent Government being established, we shall be very glad to acknowledge it, because we think that would be a very great good not only to the people of Mexico but also to all Europe. If, on the other hand, we find matters still uncertain, and a war still going on, which may result one way or the other, we shall say the Government is not of a kind that would justify us in acknowledging the Archduke as Emperor of Mexico—

PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT.

Message to attend the LORDS COMMISSIONERS.

The House went, and the ROYAL ASSENT was given to several Bills; And afterwards a Speech of The LORDS COMMISSIONERS was delivered to both Houses of Parliament by The LORD CHANCELLOR.

Then a Commission for proroguing the Parliament was read.

After which

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said—

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, under the Great Seal, to us and other Lords directed, and now read, we do, in Her Majesty's Name, and in obedience to Her Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Thursday the Thirteenth day of October next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Thursday the Thirteenth day of October next.

SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. J. E. Denison), Nottinghamshire, N.

Amendment—On Motion, "That the House at its rising, &c.," Mr. Cobden moved certain Resolutions—After debate, the hon. Gentleman rose to reply, and being informed by Mr. Speaker, that having already spoken, he could not speak again, said he would put himself in order by moving an Amendment. Mr. Speaker said the hon. Member has moved an Amendment and cannot move another.—Government Manufacturing Establishments, [176] 1976

Bills relating to Public Money and Charges on the Subject—On Order of the Day for the Second Reading of the Church Rates Commutation Bill (Mr. Newdegate), Mr. Hadfield objected, that inasmuch as the 15th clause proposed that the charge, which now fell upon occupiers, should be transferred to the owners of real property, whereby such owners would be subjected to a new tax to which they have not hitherto been liable, the Bill should have originated in Committee of the whole House. Mr. Speaker said, that that rule had been held not to apply to Bills authorizing the levy of rates for local purposes by local authorities; and having cited numerous precedents, held that there had been nothing irregular in the introduction of the present Bill, [174] 1701

Bill—Bills of Indemnity—On Motion that the Under Secretaries Indemnity Bill be now read a second time, Mr. Hennessy objected that the Bill should have originated in Committee of the Whole House. Mr. Speaker said that the method adopted with reference to the Bill was perfectly correct, [175] 83

Bill—"Hybrid" Bills—Mr. Speaker states why, in his opinion, the Weighing of Grain (Port of London) Bill, has been properly introduced as a Public Bill, [176] 171

Bill—A Private Bill repealing certain provisions of a Public Act will not be stopped on a point of Order.—Metropolitan Districts Railway Bill, [176] 1619

Bill—Opposed Public Bill — Indian Medical Service Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir Charles Wood and The Marquess of Hartington.—Viscount Palmerston having moved the third reading, Mr. Hennessy objected that it was irregular that an opposed Bill should be moved by any one except the Minister in charge of it. Mr. Speaker said, that the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench were responsible for such Bill, [176] 1234

Committee—A Committee has not the power to put an end to a Bill referred to it—Court of Chancery (Ireland) Bill considered in Committee—Moved, "That the Chairman do leave the chair"—On division, agreed to June 21 [No Report].—On the following day The Attorney General for Ireland moved, "That this House will, upon Thursday next, resolve itself into a Committee, &c."—Objected to, on the ground that the decision of the Committee was, in practice, conclusive against the further progress of the Bill in the present Session. Mr. Speaker said, a Bill is referred to a Committee in order that it may be considered and amended; but the

Committee have no power to put an end to the Bill; that power the House retains to itself:—And Mr. Speaker delivered his opinion at length, [176] 99

Debate—A Member may not speak a second time on the same Motion—On Motion for Committee of Supply, Mr. Scully moved an Amendment, which was withdrawn—Afterwards Mr. Longfield made some observations on the subject of the Law Life Assurance Company—Mr. Scully rose to address the House. Mr. Speaker said that the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. Longfield) having moved no Amendment, the Question before the House was the same as that on which the hon. Member for Cork had already spoken, [175] 769. — Government Manufacturing Establishments, [176] 1796

Debate—The House, under special circumstances, will allow a Member to address it a second time on the same Motion, [173] 1549; [174] 695

Debate—Right of Reply—Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, as amended, considered—Mr. J. B. Smith moved to insert in Schedule (A) the words “until the first day of August, 1865”—After debate, Mr. J. B. Smith rose to reply—When Mr. Speaker said that the hon. Member's proposition having been introduced as an Amendment, he was not entitled to a reply, [174] 2022

Debate—Reference to a past debate out of order, [176] 34, 1328

Debate—Reference to a previous debate—A Member may not repeat the words spoken in debate on a previous evening. Though it be a personal explanation it is exceedingly inconvenient to refer at great length to a previous debate, [173] 1912

Debate—Reference to a speech delivered in this House in the course of the present Session, out of order, [175] 1747

Debate—Reference to documents not upon the table—“The despatches should be laid on the table before the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Layard) can quote from them.”—Denmark and Germany (Mr. Disraeli's Resolution), [176] 962

Debate—Reference to particular items in Estimates which were about to be discussed, not in order, [173] 903, 904

A Member, on Motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair, may bring forward a subject of which he has given notice, arising out of the Votes in the Appropriation Bill, without waiting for the particular section of the Bill to which the subject refers, [176] 1859

Debate—Discussion of the subject matter of a Motion fixed for a future day, not in order.—Casual Poor (Metropolis) Bill, [176] 1803

Debate—Discussion of the merits of a Bill which stood for discussion to-morrow, not in order, [176] 1797

Debate—A Question already before the House must be disposed of before an hon. Member can proceed with his Notice, [173] 1077

Debate—Resolution (Denmark and Germany) proposed (Mr. Bernal Osborne)—An Amendment moved thereon—After debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn—Original Question again proposed. Mr. Speaker said, that the Amendment had been withdrawn by the consent of the House; but as the House did not consent to the withdrawal of the Original Motion, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) would have an opportunity of moving the Previous Question—Whereupon Previous Question put, and negatived, [174] 1376

Debate—Latitude in argument—A Member was not in order in discussing the question of costs (which had already been incidentally discussed in that debate, and which there would be other opportunities of discussing) on a Resolution relating to ad valorem fees.—Private Bills—Resolution, [173] 671

The House having decided that a Committee should be appointed, it was desirable, under ordinary circumstances, that the discussion should be confined to the names of the Members of whom it should be composed; but it was impossible to prescribe the limits to which the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) might extend in his endeavour to procure the substitution of one name for another.—Scientific Institutions, Dublin, [174] 1274

Debate—Latitude in argument—Malt for Cattle Bill—Order for Committee read—Moved, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair”—Mr. Bass observed upon the whole subject, and having referred to the malt duty was proceeding to compare the relative taxation on spirits and wines—Mr. Packe rose to order: the hon. Member was travelling out of the Question, which related solely to the making of malt for cattle. Mr. Speaker said, that the hon. Member was quite in order—Upon the Motion the whole subject might be discussed, [173] 1026

Debate—Latitude permitted to a Minister in answering a Question.—Departure of General Garibaldi, [174] 1423

Debate—Limitation of explanation—An hon. Member can only explain an observation of his own which has been misunderstood—he cannot reply to the remarks of any one else.—The Charity Commissioners, [175] 1876—Government Annuities Bill, [174] 210

Or go beyond explanation.—St. Mary's Burial Ground, Sydenham, [174] 661

Debate—Limitation of personal explanation in respect of a previous debate—Reference at such great length (as the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty was then making) is exceedingly inconvenient.—Navy Estimates, [173] 1912-13

Debate—Personal explanation when no Question before the House—Mr. Lowe having offered an explanation of his resignation of his office, and a lengthened conversation having arisen thereon, Mr. Speaker interposed.—Education—Reports of the Inspectors, [174] 1216

Debate—Unparliamentary Expressions—Mr. Gathorne Hardy having referred to a “calumnious statement” of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Layard rising to order, Mr. Speaker said, there did not appear to be anything calling for his interference; and referred to the warm and exciting nature of the debate.—Denmark and Germany (Mr. Disraeli's Resolution), [176] 1003, 1005

Division—Mr. Speaker's Casting Vote—Tests Abolition (Oxford) Bill—Main Question, "That the Bill be now read a third time" put; the House divided, and the numbers being equal, Mr. Speaker declared himself with the "Ayes" and stated his reason, [176] 678

Division—The Question on Mr. Newdegate's Amendment on Mr. Disraeli's Motion respecting Denmark and Germany, having been put, the House being very full, and a great preponderance of voices appearing to be for the "Ayes," so that the lobby could not contain them, Mr. Speaker proposed an arrangement to avoid the inconvenience—But Mr. Newdegate did not press for a division, [176] 1299

Motion—According to the rules of the House, no Question or Amendment may be proposed which is the same in substance as any Question which, during the same Session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative, [176] 497

Motion—Private Bills, Resolution—Resolution 7, and Amendment thereon withdrawn—The hon. Member for Devizes proposed to move a Resolution. Mr. Speaker said, that there being no Motion before the House, the hon. Member could not move a Resolution of which he had given no notice, [173] 680

Motion—The Appropriation Bill—A Member will be in order in bringing forward, on Motion that Mr. Speaker leave the chair, a subject of which he has given notice, arising out of the Votes included in the Bill, without waiting for the particular section of the Bill to which the subject refers.—Consolidated Fund (Appropriation Bill)—Committee, [176] 1859

Order—Committee of Supply—Mr. Speaker having put the Question, "That I leave the chair," and having declared "The Ayes have it," left the chair—Complaint arising that the House had been taken by surprise, and Mr. Speaker having resumed the chair, Sir Harry Verney said, "Sir, I rise to move the adjournment of the House." Mr. Speaker said, the hon. Member can address the House on a Question of Order without moving the adjournment—Mr. Speaker states the circumstances, [174] 1958, 1960

Privilege—A matter of Privilege which claims this precedence (over the Orders of the Day) should be some subject which has recently arisen and which clearly involves the Privileges of this House and calls for its immediate interposition—Mr. Stansfeld and the Greco Conspiracy, [174] 190

Privilege—A Question of Privilege having been raised, that must be decided before an hon. Member can proceed to address the House Privilege—Dispute arising as to allegations of fact, between Mr. H. B. Sheridan and Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the matter being brought under the notice of the House by Sir John Hay as a Question of Privilege—Mr. Speaker suggested that it would not be a convenient course to extend the area of Privilege without due consideration; and expressed his opinion that this matter did not distinctly concern the Privileges of the House; and he recommended as a more convenient course, if the House deemed this a matter which it would be proper at once to entertain, rather to postpone the other Orders of the Day until after the Motion of the hon. Member for Wakefield had been disposed of.—Government Annuities Bill (Mr. H. B. Sheridan), [174] 306, 307

Question—Latitude of observation in putting a Question—It is a rule of the House that an hon. Member putting a Question must confine himself strictly to the facts necessary to explain it, [175] 100

Question—Latitude permitted to a Minister in answering a Question.—Departure of General Garibaldi, [174] 1423

Questions to Private Members—The rule of the House with respect to asking Questions of a private Member is, that any Question may be put relating to any Bill, Motion, or other public matter connected with the business of the House in which such Member may be concerned, [174] 1914

Select Committee—Notice must be given of an Instruction to a Select Committee on a Bill.—Factory Acts Extension, [175] 1940

Select Committee—A Select Committee on the Bankruptcy Act having been appointed, to consist of fifteen Members; and it being proposed to add Mr. Roebuck, and to substitute Mr. Vance for Mr. Hassard—Mr. Speaker held that notice of the proposed alterations must be given, [174] 501, 1569

Mr. Speaker—His Power—Power having been given by Act of Parliament to Mr. Speaker to regulate certain charges (in respect of Private Bills), it is not competent for the House to order that "counsel's fees" should be inserted in the Resolution, the powers given by the Act not extending to any control over the fees of counsel conducting business before Committees.—Private Bills—Resolution 5, [173] 676

His Power over Members—It having been suggested that the Chairman of the Court of Referees on Private Bills should be a Member of the House, and that Mr. Speaker should appoint him—Mr. Speaker reminded the House that he had no power to compel an hon. Member to undertake the duty, and that the possibility of putting such a provision into effect would depend upon the willingness of any Member to fill the office.—Revision of Standing Orders, [176] 2144

Supply—"The House having already resolved 'that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question,' it is not competent for the hon. Member to move any further Amendment to the Motion, That I do leave the chair," [173] 1416; [175] 664; [176] 649

Supply—Reference to particular items in Estimates which are about to be discussed, not in order, [173] 903, 904

Supply—An Amendment to the Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair," having been moved and carried; and afterwards it was moved, "That this House do immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply," and agreed to—On Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair," Mr. Digby Seymour rose to bring forward a matter of which he had given notice. Mr. Speaker said, "It had been for some years the practice of the House, under such circumstances, for the Minister to move that the House should immediately resolve itself into a Committee of Supply, and that the Speaker should leave the chair. Such a Motion had been made, and the business of the evening might then proceed without interruption," [174] 1940

Supply—Rule as to putting Resolutions on Report of Supply.—The rule of the House is this—On the Report of Supply, the Question is, "That this Resolution be read a first time." Then, "That it be read a second time."—When the Question is put, "That the Resolution be read a second time," it is open to any hon. Member to offer any observations he may think necessary, [174] 1551

Vote of a Member personally interested in the Motion.—The rule of the House is that no Member can vote on a Question in which he is peculiarly interested; and, also, there are occasions when it is becoming for a Member to leave the House before the division, although there is no positive charge against him. The Vote of the previous evening however was, whether or not certain matters did not require the serious consideration of the House; and it could not be said, on any interpretation of the rules of the House, that the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) ought not to have voted on that Question.—M. Mazzini—The Greco Conspiracy, [174] 340

SESSION 1864.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

It being a principal object of this Index, that the proceedings on each Motion shall be completely recorded, some abbreviations of forms were necessary. Those who are accustomed to the proceedings of Parliament, will readily fill up the voids. Those who are not so familiar, may find the following explanation useful, but will find the whole formulæ set out at length in the "Contents."

The names which immediately follow the title of a Bill are those of the Peers or hon. Members who have charge of the Bill.

The numbers which are added at stages of Bills are the official numbers of the prints and reprints ordered at each stage, and, with the Statute, will enable the reader to follow all the changes the Bill has undergone.

The entries—Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d"; Amendt. "this day six months;" Question put, "That 'now' &c."—indicate the usual form of raising the issue—namely, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

"Crown Lands, Inclosure of, Amendt. on Committee of Supply" indicates that the Question was raised by means of an Amendment moved on the Motion (after the Order of the Day for the House to go into Committee of Supply had been read), "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair." In this case the issue is formally raised by the Motion "To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add" other words. The decision is taken on the Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The Nos. added to the "Parliamentary Papers" are in most cases those given in the Commons' "List of Papers for Sale."
